Second. It is urged that Senator OWEN, while attorney for the Mississippi Choctaws, insisted that they should be enrolled. Senator OWEN, in extended hearings before the Senate Indian Committee (pp. 74–108, Jan. 18, 1915; and pp. 645–661, Feb. 5, 1915) stated that great generosity has been shown the Mississippi Choctaws, and that the rolls should now be closed, giving his reasons in detail why they should not be reopened. In other words, he makes the opposite contention. He shows that all differences were compromised by section 41 of the act of July 1, 1902.

Third. It is contended that the Eastern Cherokee case reported in Two hundred and second United States, 101, supports his contention. An examination of that case shows it does not support their contention, and that it was not a suit over the lands of the Cherokees west, or the proceeds thereof, nor for a division of their trust funds. On the other hand, the Cherokee case reported in One hundred and seventeenth United States, 288, is a case in point and is against their contention.

Fourth. It is urged that Judge Townsend, in an ex parte decision, held that the Mississippi Choctows were entitled to be enrolled without removing to the Indian Territory, now Oklahoma. This was when the Choctaw Nation was not represented, and later, in the case of Ikard against Minter, which was affirmed by the Indian Territory court of appeals, in an opinion written by Judge Gill (4 Ind. Ter. Repts., 214), after a full hearing and after the matter had been argued and briefed on both sides, Judge Townsend held that the Mississippi Choctaws were not entitled to be enrolled.

EVERY DECISION AGAINST MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAWS.

Judge Clayton, in the Amos case, decided against them; Judge Townsend decided against them in the case of Ikard against Minter, supra, and the court of appeals, speaking through Judge Gill, in the case of Ikard against Minter, affirmed the decision of Judge Townsend. All three of the Federal judges in the Indian Territory held against the enrollment of the Mississippi Choctaws.

Hence, it will be seen that the law is against the Mississippi Choctaws, the decision of every court is against them, and the report of every committee of Congress is against them, as well as the report of every Secretary of the Interior. They ask now to have the matter again referred to the courts, when for 20 years every court, committee, commission, or Secretary of the Interior to which this question was presented has decided against them.

Thus you will see that the Choctaw people are asking not for money from the Government but to have their own money paid them. Certainly this is a reasonable request. The Government promised it to them. It is theirs. They are in very great need of it. Many of them have long ago gone to their reward. Others are old and decrepit and diseased. Congress should do justice to them and give them this money.

Now, every person making an argument before the Indian Committee and before Congress in favor of the enrollment of the Mississippi Choctaws makes it admitting that the Mississippi Choctaws have no legal rights, makes it admitting that they did not remove to the Choctaw Nation, and makes it admitting that they are residents of the State of Mississippi, are citizens of that State and of the United States.

Everyone must admit that the Choctaw Nation has been more than generous with them, and all must admit that all the Choctaws who removed to the Choctaw Nation and became bona fide settlers there before the rolls were closed and remained there were enrolled.

Everyone making an argument in their behalf makes it admitting that their enrollment was provided for by section 21 of the act of June 28, 1898, and provided for by the act of May 31, 1900, conditioned only upon their removing to the Choctaw Nation and permanently locating there, and provided for by the act of July 1, 1902, similarly conditioned.

FINAL SETTLEMENT URGED.

Surely Congress will not longer delay the final settlement of Choctaw tribal affairs. It has now been too long delayed. This money should not only be paid but Congress should at once provide for the disposition of the coal lands and other tribal property belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw people, and all their money should be prorated among them.

It is generally known and it appears in the records that a great lobby has been organized to secure the enrollment of the Mississippi Choctaws and that contracts have been secured aggregating millions of dollars. Interested attorneys have made all sorts of speeches and arguments looking to a delay in the payment of the Choctaw money and urging the reopening of the rolls. Surely Congress will follow the decisions of the courts, the Dawes Commission, the Secretaries of the Interior, and the committees of Congress, who have given extensive hearings to this question, rather than the pleadings of interested attorneys, who will be enriched by the reopening of the rolls.

Almost 19 years have elapsed since the first Choctaw agreement was entered into in 1897. If the question of citizenship is again reopened, a settlement of it will not be reached within the next quarter of a century.

As a final word, I beg the Members of Congress to at least give a small measure of justice to the Choctaw and Chickasaw people and provide for a partial distribution of their funds now. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe the time for general debate has expired, and I would ask that the bill be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that, as debate is closed, it is not necessary to commence the reading now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent Mr. SLEMP was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies thereof, the papers in the following cases, no adverse reports having been made thereon:

James D. Cox (63d Cong.);
Thomas Swallow (63d Cong.); and
Mrs. Noble C. Burkhart (63d Cong.).

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8235. An act to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, February 1, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1916.

(Continuation of legislative day of Monday, January 31, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 381.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Harding	Myers	Smoot
Beckham	Hardwick	Nelson	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Stone
Bryan	Hollis	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	James	Poindexter	Thompson
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pomerene	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Reed	Wadsworth
Colt	La Follette	Robinson	Walsh
Cummins	Lane	Shafroth	Warren
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Weeks
Dillingham	Lippitt	Shields	Works
du Pont	McCumber	Simmons
Fletcher	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to state that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is absent from the city on official business.

Mr. STONE. I announce the illness of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and his inability to be present. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BRYAN. I was requested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to announce his absence on business of the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the illness of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, three commissioners to cooperate with the Philippine Legislature in preparing and submitting a constitution or plan of government for the people of the Philippine Islands as an independent nation. The constitution or plan shall be one best adapted to protect and preserve the rights and liberties of the people of the islands, and most likely to be efficient in maintaining law and order, and in promoting progress and prosperity.

Among other things, it shall provide for the complete possession and sovereignty on the part of the United States, in perpetuity, of such coaling stations and naval bases as may be prescribed by the President of the United States. The said constitution or plan of government shall be prepared by the Philippine Legislature and submitted to the said commissioners, and if approved by the said commissioners, or a majority of them, and adopted by the said legislature, it shall then be submitted to the qualified electors of the Philippine Islands for approval or rejection at an election to be appointed by the Philippine Legislature after not less than four months' notice.

If a majority of the electors voting at said election shall approve the said constitution or plan of government and thereby indicate their desire for complete separation from the United States, as well as their approval of the particular constitution or plan, the said Philippine Legislature shall proceed to the establishment of the government so authorized, and when it is ready to assume the full government of the islands, the President of the United States shall withdraw the military force of this country and all the representatives of this Government; and thereafter shall treat the government so established in the Philippine Islands as a separate and independent government; and the relation of the United States toward such government shall thereafter be the relation which is sustained toward all other foreign powers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is with a great deal of reluctance that I enter upon any discussion of this very complicated although very interesting subject. It is vain for me to hope that I can aid Senators in reaching a conclusion upon it, for the debate has taken a wide range and, it seems to me, has disclosed every possible fact, material and immaterial.

I am speaking because I will be compelled to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, and likewise I shall feel that it is my duty to vote against the preamble reported by the committee. It might be inferred from the votes that I shall so cast that I am opposed to complete separation from the Philippine Islands and the Philippine Government, and inasmuch as I sincerely believe that it is the duty of the United States to withdraw from those islands, assisting the people there to establish a government of their own, I must at least give to the Senate my reasons for opposing the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas and for believing that the time has come for the long-promised separation between the people of the archipelago and the people of the United States.

I listened with very great care and great interest to the observations made by the Senator from Arkansas. Generally speaking, his view is my view upon this subject, but the argument of the Senator from Arkansas is not embodied in the amendment which he has offered. The conclusions which he established and satisfactorily sustained are not found, as I look at it, in the amendment which he has submitted.

There has been a suggestion from time to time of partisanship in this question. So far as I am concerned I do not feel the burden of any political declaration with regard to the Philippine Islands, and I shall vote precisely as my judgment and my conscience lead me to vote, without respect to any declaration made by any political party.

But it is only fair to say that the amendment which I have proposed is not a fulfillment of the declaration of our friends upon the other side. As I view it, it is absolutely in harmony with the position which Republicans have heretofore assumed with respect to this very difficult subject. May I remark just here that in our last convention this was the statement made by the Republican organization:

> The Philippine policy of the Republican Party has been and is inspired by the belief that our duty toward the Filipino people is a national obligation which should remain entirely free from partisan politics.

I am endeavoring as best I can to exemplify this command of the Republican Party, for I agree, and you must all agree, that this subject should be dealt with entirely independently of any political organization, for our duty calls into exercise the highest, the most unselfish faculties of the mind and the heart.

We are not going to settle, and we can not settle, this problem by reference to any partisan advantage. May I at the same time suggest that the platform of the Democratic Party upon this subject in its last convention was a declaration of "purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established"; and, second, a guarantee of independence "until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers."

I am wholly opposed to that view of the matter. I can not believe that it is wise to make a declaration of independence to be fulfilled at some day, some distant time, and under conditions which may never arise. I can not believe that it is wise for the Government of the United States to hold the Philippine Islands until the great powers of the world shall guarantee their neutralization, for, in my opinion, that means to hold them forever.

I am not suggesting what our friends upon the other side of the Chamber ought to do with respect to this platform. I am simply making clear, if I can, that the amendment which I have proposed does not follow the direction of any political platform, much less the declaration of the platform announced at Baltimore in 1912.

I am in favor, Mr. President, of the complete separation of this Government from the Philippine Islands, because I believe that the time has come, under the view which all Republicans, or nearly all Republicans, have taken in the past for the separation. I believe that the separation ought to take place without any declaration and subject to no conditions whatsoever. In view of that position I desire to say a few words upon the general subject.

Is it not true that substantially all the people of the United States, without respect to party, have believed that our occupation of the Philippine Islands was to be temporary? Is there a word in the literature of this subject from any source—I care not what may be its partisan tinge—is there a single suggestion from any source in the last 18 years that the United States should permanently occupy the Philippine Islands and govern the Philippine people as a dependency? There is not. From McKinley, a man of the rarest wisdom, of the greatest foresight, of infinite comprehension almost of human needs and human rights, to the present moment, so far as I have observed, no citizen of the United States has ever suggested that our relation with the Philippine Islands, the relation established originally and still maintained, should be permanent.

Those who knew the great President of 1898 best know that he did not want to occupy the Philippine Islands at all. We all know how he struggled patiently and courageously against the tempest of passion which swept over the United States and which finally impelled him, against his better judgment, into the war of 1898. It is a part of the learning of the time, a part of the understanding of the time, that if he could have prevented it, after the brave and gallant Dewey had destroyed the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay, there would have been no landing of our soldiers and no occupation of those islands. I am not disparaging the admiral whose deeds are admired and whose courage is applauded all over the country; he did what he believed to be his duty; but I feel that I know if it had not been for a fortuitous circumstance that need not be related here, Dewey would have sailed away from Manila Bay after the destruction of the Spanish fleet, and there would have been no conquest of the Philippine Islands, no occupation by the United States.

I agree, however, that when we did occupy those islands there fell upon us a duty. We could not then depart; we could not abandon the Philippine Islands to the chaos that must necessarily have ensued. We did the best we could. I agree with every word that has been spoken here with regard to the character of our conduct toward the Philippines. It is without parallel in the history of the world. Our generosity, our liberality, our justice, our magnanimity, have no predecessor; possibly they will have no successor. We have accomplished almost a miracle amongst those people; but I assume we have accomplished it all with the end in view which the statesmen in 1898 and all the statesmen since have proclaimed, namely, that whenever we could leave those islands in honor and with safety to the people of the islands we would leave them. No other construction can be given to the statement of President McKinley quoted by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I agree with him that there was no explicit promise of independence, but the language used by McKinley at that time is incapable of misunderstanding and it can not be harmonized with the proposal permanently to incorporate the Philippine Islands into the United States, unless we are willing to extend to them all the privileges, all the rights, that are now enjoyed by the citizens of our several Commonwealths.

I am not frightened with respect to conquest. It is the history of the world, and I could not but agree in great measure with the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] upon that subject. He cleared away some of the mist that has so long obscured it. The history of the world is the history of conquest. As I said, interrupting some Senator the other day, all the territory, or practically all the territory, now held by the United States it holds by the title of conquest. With the exception of the Hawaiian Islands, a Government which came into the United States upon its own application, and with the exception of Alaska, and possibly with another little exception which did not occur to me at that time, all our territory has been acquired by conquest, not technically, but in fact. As I suggested, France had no title to the great expanse of territory, the vast empire, which she conveyed to us. She had a mere paper title, possibly respected among nations, but which had little substance; and it was the genius and courage of the American people which finally reduced that magnificent domain to the possession of the United States and opened it to the hardy adventurers and settlers of our country.

But I beg to remind the Senator from Ohio and all others here that in our acquisition of territory and of people we never acquired one inch of soil prior to the war of 1898 that was not intended to become a part of the Union. Hawaii intends to become a State. If you take away that hope and belief from the hearts of the people of the Hawaiian Islands you will produce a condition of discontent that will destroy their growth and prosperity. Alaska intends to become a State of the Union, or a part of a State, and no loyal American dare question the ultimate outcome of our relations with Alaska. It was not until the Spanish-American War and our occupation of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico that there was established between our country and any other the relation of parent Government and colony or dependency, a dependency that we did not intend should ever become a part and parcel of the Government of the United States. If those who are opposed to separation from the Philippine Islands are willing to avow their purpose to ultimately consolidate those islands with the United States completely and perfectly and give them not only the right to govern themselves as citizens of a State, but give them the right to help govern you and me as citizens of the United States, then there is presented a basis which may logically be considered upon its merits; but that is not the purpose of any Senator here.

I know the time of separation is vague and uncertain in the minds of many Senators; I know that the conditions of separation are not agreed upon; but we all agree that we are not working toward the admission of the Philippine Islands as a State or as a number of States into the Union, and that, so long as our relation to them continues, so long the Congress of the United States, which those people do not help to elect, over which they have no influence whatsoever, is master of their destinies.

We all have confidence in our altruism. We all believe that there will never come a time, no matter how long we may continue to occupy the islands, when we will treat them unjustly; but still we are the masters. We can withdraw any moment every right and privilege which we have granted to them. The bill which is now before the Senate, if it were passed, granting them further privileges, enlarging their opportunity for local self-government, could be repealed in a moment, and we could declare that the islands shall be placed in the hands of a dictator without any rule of law to govern or control him. I am not suggesting that this will be done, but it can be done. It is in the power which one nation has over another; it is in the power which one individual has over another that is found all the evils of supremacy and servitude.

I refer for just a moment to some of the things that distinguished men of the party to which I belong and which is represented on this side of the Chamber have said. President McKinley phrased it beautifully when he declared:

> The Philippines are ours, not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government.

Is there a man here who dares mar the memory of that great man with the suggestion that he intended that the United States should for all time control the Philippines as a colony or a dependency? I hope not, for the suggestion would assail not only the obvious meaning of his words but the purity and sincerity of his motives as well.

President Roosevelt said:

> I trust that within a generation—

And this was spoken some years ago—

> the time will arrive when the Philippines can decide for themselves whether it is well for them to become independent or to continue under the protection of a strong and disinterested power, able to guarantee to the islands order at home and protection from foreign invasion. But no one can prophesy the exact date when it will be wise to consider independence as a fixed and definite policy.

Wiser words were never spoken. No one could prophesy, and if the time has not now come no one can prophesy when it will come, and therefore there should be no declaration of purpose. If the hour has not arrived at which it is our duty to separate ourselves from the Philippine Islands, let us be silent with respect to the future.

President Taft said:

> It necessarily involves in its ultimate conclusion as the steps toward self-government become greater and greater the ultimate independence of the islands; although, of course, if both the United States and the islands were to conclude after complete self-government were possible that it would be mutually beneficial to continue a governmental relation between them like that between England and Australia, there would be nothing inconsistent with the present policy in such a result.

I agree with every sentiment there expressed; for if the Philippine people desire to continue relations with the United States it is our bounden duty, no matter what the burden is, no matter what the danger may be, to continue that relation. There is just one obligation, in my opinion, that rests upon the American people that can never be lifted save by the consent of the Philippine people themselves. We conquered the country. We have brought them, in a sense, into the American Government; and so long as they desire our protection and our help, so long we are bound to give them that protection and that help, and we are held in honor to maintain that relation.

I need not read further from the statements and speeches and declarations of men distinguished in the country and in the party. I concede to the Senator from Rhode Island that there is no binding promise here. No one has ever had authority to speak for the American Government, but all people have had authority to speak in order to create a sentiment among the American people. All people have a right to declare their opinions in order to widen and deepen the prevalent belief among the people. From the very beginning these views with regard to the Philippines have been so general, they have been so universal, that although we are under no technical obligation to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, we have created in America a sentiment which nothing can destroy.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator maintain, even assuming for the sake of the question that either now or at some time in the future the Philippine people are as well qualified to govern themselves as we are, that we should permit them to decide, without taking into consideration the interests or the views of our own people, whether or not their relationship to us should be severed?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely the thought I tried to express.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I should like to ask the Senator, if that be his view, why in the amendment that he proposes and that he is now discussing he provides that the President, in giving them independence if they so vote, shall retain on behalf of our Government sovereignty in perpetuity over such coaling stations and naval bases as he may think best? If we are going to let the Philippine people decide, without consulting the American people, whether they should be independent or not, why does it not follow that our retention of a naval base and a coaling station should likewise be submitted to the Philippine people?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not attach nearly the importance to that subject that the Senator from Nebraska finds in it, but in the main I agree with him. The retention of a coaling station or a naval base does not involve government over anybody. It does not involve the subjection of any part of the Philippine people to the Government of the United States. I suppose the reason why that is in my amendment is because I followed what seemed to be an accepted form. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska; I see no benefit in either a naval base or a coaling station in the Philippine Islands, and if anyone moves to strike it out I may vote with him and strike it out of my amendment. But the Senator will notice that I have not made it obligatory on the President. It is within the discretion of the President to reserve these things or not, as he may think they are necessary or not for the welfare of the people of this country. I am entirely willing and frank to say, however, that I can see no reason for either a naval base or a coaling station.

Mr. NORRIS. The question was based, of course, on the theory that the Senator himself says he believes in; that is, that we should not turn the Philippines loose without the consent of the Philippine people. We should not turn them loose against their will. I suppose it would follow that we should not retain them against their will. In fact, that is what the Senator has provided, and I am in entire accord with him in the provision in that respect; but the coaling station and the naval base are to be retained under the sovereignty of the United States. They are a part of those islands; and if we ought to be moved by the decision of the Philippine people as to the islands, I do not see why the same logic would not apply to a part of the islands.

I should like to make a further suggestion to the Senator. I should be glad to move to strike out those words; but is it not true, in a parliamentary sense, that this amendment is already in the third degree, and that no amendment can be offered unless the Senator himself, who has full control over his amendment, modifies it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not sure whether it is in the third degree or not; but, at any rate, I have given no great thought or attention to the proposition to reserve coaling stations and naval bases. I am not much of a military man, and I do not know what the safety or welfare of our country requires in that respect. I will consider the suggestion just made by the Senator from Nebraska about striking them out. But, Mr. President, I think I have shown sufficiently——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, before he leaves that point, I wish to call his attention to another suggestion. The Senator says that these words are not compulsory. As I read them, the only thing that is discretionary with the President is how much he shall retain; but it is compulsory under his amendment, as I read it, that he shall retain in perpetuity coaling stations and naval bases, and they are both in the plural.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was not my purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I will read the words to the Senator and see if he does not agree with me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing that that shall be made a part of the agreement between the Philippine people and ourselves. I do not follow the Senator from Nebraska, I think, to his conclusion, namely, that we have been a trespasser in the Philippine Islands. I think we have been rightfully in the Philippine Islands and that what we have done there has been done in the exercise of lawful authority.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, the Senator can not construe anything I have said to mean that we are trespassers.

If the Senator will permit me further, this is the language:

Among other things, it shall provide—

"It" means the constitution, I think, that they shall adopt.

Among other things, it shall provide for the complete possession and sovereignty—on the part of the United States, in perpetuity, of such coaling stations and naval bases as may be prescribed by the President of the United States.

"It shall"—

Mr. CUMMINS. I still suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if the President of the United States does not prescribe any coaling stations or naval bases there will be none reserved.

Mr. NORRIS. But the constitution of the Philippine people which the Senator has provided shall be adopted must make that provision; and does the Senator think that if Congress should pass this law the President would not make a selection, no matter what he might think about it? Would it not be his duty to do it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. I did not intend, anyhow, that it should be made his duty to do it unless he believed, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, that such places were necessary for our military forces.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have noticed the willingness of the Senator from Iowa to have that provision of his amendment stricken out. If the amendment is to be agreed to, I hope it will not be stricken out. We are being told from the "seats of the mighty" at the present time that the air is surcharged with rumors of war and the possibility of war, and we have heard it repeated and reiterated over and over again, even in this Chamber, that there is a possibility of future war with the Empire of Japan. If that calamity should come, would it not be well for the United States to have a fortified base in the Philippine Islands where at least our ships that might be sent to that far-off land to fight a valiant foe, could coal and get supplies?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is just the question that I feel incompetent to answer. I do not know enough about military affairs to know whether a coaling station and a naval base in the Philippine Islands, after we have withdrawn from the islands, would be sources of strength or sources of weakness. I want them if the would be sources of strength. I do not want them if they would be sources of weakness, and I intended in my amendment to leave that discretion to the President of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. The wise nation that almost governs the world, situated on a little island, has not neglected to plant its outposts all over the world, so that in the event of war it might have the advantage of supplying its navy and its army with provisions and with coal and with every other accessory of war. It seems to me that if we are going to surrender the Philippine Islands—which I hope we will not do, because I think it is scuttling the ship at too early a date—if we are to do so, I hope we will be wise enough, at least, to provide against the contingencies of a war on the Pacific by retaining a sufficient portion of the islands to give us some advantage in a war of that character.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer that by saying that as a matter of pride I do not want anything there. As a matter of safety we may need these places, and I tried in my amendment to submit that question to one whose business it is to know whether we need them or not.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. The Senator says he thinks we are scuttling the ship too early. When does the Senator think—and I ask the question in the utmost sincerity—that we could in all probability release the islands, if at all?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know when we should release the islands, if we ever conclude to do it. Great Britain has not released Canada or Australia or her other possessions, and Canada to-day is furnishing a quarter of a million soldiers to help fight the battles of the mother country. We may need some native soldiers in the Philippine Islands in the future, if we retain them, to help us fight our battles. I do not know when the time will come. I believe it is a matter of very questionable statesmanship to think of doing it at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think that the alternative here is either to release them as soon as we can do so decently, or else to settle down to the proposition that they are ours to keep?

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; not that. I am going to quote words that we hear uttered so often in this Chamber—that probably there are to be as wise men here after we are gone as we are, and the great questions of that time will probably be dealt with as wisely, as intelligently, and in as statesmanlike a manner as we can deal with them to-day. Why hurry? What is the haste? We are doing a magnificent work in the Philippine Islands—a work that has challenged the admiration of the peoples of the world. Why are we in haste to get out of the Philippine Islands and to leave them to possible internecine war, which, in my opinion, is sure to come if we yield our authority and take away from those people our sustaining and protecting hand? That is my view, and I am not in a hurry to get out.

Mr. BORAH. I simply wanted the view of the Senator as to when we probably would get out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska, if he desires to discuss this question.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I ought to take up the time of the Senator from Iowa in referring to what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, but if we did not have the Philippine Islands then I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa or anyone else why we need a coaling station in Asia, unless we expect at some time in the future to go on a war of conquest. If we are going to arm only to defend ourselves, and we have nothing over there to defend, then I should like somebody to explain why it is that we need a naval base for our Navy, which ought to be at home.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not able to answer the Senator from Nebraska, because I am unable to conceive a reason for these military strongholds. I admit, however, that my judgment in regard to that matter is not entitled to very great weight, for I am not a military man, and I have not studied the affairs of the world from that standpoint. Therefore it may be that those who have given it comprehensive study would be competent to say why we should have these military points in the Orient, and therefore it was my purpose to leave it in the discretion of the President.

Mr. STONE rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, suppose we had never been authoritatively in the Philippine Islands, suppose the suggestion which has been made this morning by some Senator, and indeed has been often made, had been actually observed, and Admiral Dewey, after the Battle of Manila, had sailed away and we had never taken possession of the islands, would it not be advisable and really a wise thing at this time, treating with the Filipinos as a separate and independent people, to acquire a naval base and a coaling station in that part of the world for our uses?

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, we as a people have great interests in the Orient. All nations have an interest in the Orient entirely aside from the mere desire to acquire and exercise sovereignty over territory. Away back we have had great commercial interests in the Orient. I need not elaborate that; everyone will agree. We have heard a great deal about the open door in China. That is a very well accepted policy in this country and in other countries. It has in large measure been universally agreed to by the leading nations. Now and then circumstances arise that create some degree of alarm, greater or less. The Senator and the Senate recall that not many years ago we joined with other nations in sending an expeditionary force to the capital of China, and we are to-day exercising conjointly with other nations certain power and authority in keeping an open way from that capital to the sea. Is it possible for us here now, looking down through the years that are to come when we have all disappeared, to tell how important, how sudden and imperative our interests may become in that region of the world?

If happily, as I think, we should rehabilitate our merchant marine, whether by one process or another, so as to increase our interests on the Pacific and in the Far East, would it not be wise, if to-day we had no connection with the Philippines, to establish a naval base and a coaling station, not merely to furnish fuel power to our warships, but as a refuge and shelter to our merchant ships and as a means of supplying them with necessities?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has very ably and very clearly given his reasons for believing that we ought to have the coaling stations and the naval bases. I am still, however, unable to decide with respect to the wisdom of doing it. It may be wise. I am not sure whether if we were offered a naval base on the coast of China it would be wise to accept it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Or if offered a coaling station upon the coast of Japan I am not sure whether it would be wise to accept it, or one upon the coast of England or of France or of Germany. I do not know. I am rather old fashioned in my views. I remember the admonition of the Father of his Country and I like to avoid entangling alliances across the sea so far as it is possible to avoid them. I know we can not escape them as completely as they could have been escaped in those primitive days, but still we ought to have as little to do in a governmental way, in a sovereign way, with the powers on the Pacific or with the Continent of Europe as possible.

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator two questions. The first one is, if the argument of the Senator from Missouri, which the Senator from Iowa has very well said was perfectly plain and logical, is good, then does it not follow that we ought to make the same effort to get a naval base and coaling station in South America and stations to develop our trade in Europe and elsewhere?

Mr. STONE. We are endeavoring to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. If it be true that it is desirable to help our trade, how can the Senator account for the fact that we have such an enormous trade with other countries and other sections of the globe where we have no coaling stations and naval bases.

The other question which I will submit at the same time is this: What would the Senator from Iowa say if Japan, for instance, made arrangements with the Government of Mexico, as soon as they get one, to have a coaling station and a naval base in the Gulf of California?

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, if Japan owned the Gulf of California and had jurisdiction over it, it would be a very different proposition from the existing one.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but we propose to give up the Philippines, and then we will own nothing. It is an exact parallel when we do that. It is not proposed by anyone to give up whatever naval bases and coaling stations we have until we do recognize the independence and surrender our sovereignty of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to perceive the relation between commerce and a naval base.

I have been very glad to hear the arguments on either side of this question, but I have carefully refrained from undertaking to decide for myself. I do not know; I only feel that if we get naval bases all over the world we shall have to distribute our Navy in such a way as that it will be very ineffective at any given point. I would rather, so far as possible, concentrate our Navy near our own shores; but I am willing to intrust that to the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and such has been my purpose in the amendment now pending before the Senate.

I recapitulate for a moment because we have drifted far from the argument I was endeavoring to make. It seems to me that it has been very clearly shown, and everybody must feel, that it has not been the purpose of the American people to hold the Philippine Islands permanently. It has not been their purpose to admit the people of the Philippine Islands to full citizenship in the Government of the United States. If it has not been our purpose to hold them permanently, if it is not our purpose to give them admission to the Union, with all the rights and privileges of citizens of the Union, then we ask ourselves, shall we follow the course of Great Britain or other continental or Asiatic countries? I say no; I do not want within the territory of the United States one single foot that may not become a part of the United States in the fullest and completest sense. Whenever this country undertakes the colonization of the world, the conquest of the world, to gather in people or countries which are not to become a part of the United States, just so soon will we have entered upon the downward course that will lead ultimately and quickly, as I believe, to the destruction of free institutions in America.

Therefore, the only question with me is, has the time come; for I shudder when anyone suggests that we shall absorb the Malays and the Japanese and the Indians and the Chinese of the Philippine Archipelago as parts of the the citizenship of the United States. No man, as it seems to me, dare propose it, for although I have the highest opinion of the qualifications and the character of the Filipino people in some regards, I do not want them to govern me, and I do not want them to vote in any election that concerns the welfare of the hundred million people who are within the present limits of our national territory.

We have great problems to solve here. We have entered upon a career that has more difficulties it its way than any government ever encountered in the whole history of the world. We need all the intelligent, patriotic, unselfish help that we can summon. Is the Senator from New Hampshire willing that the people of the Philippine Islands shall vote as to the domestic policy of the United States in dealing with our own affairs?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean when he thinks they are qualified to vote at all?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not prepared to answer that question offhand. I know that there are 28 different nationalities voting in the city of Manchester, N. H., at the present time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly aware of that, and I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire does not want to intensify that problem.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are governing us just as much as the Philippine people would if they voted. We have left that open door, and they are coming in by the million a year from the slums of Europe.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not with my consent nor with the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this matter as to when the time will come for us to abandon the Philippine Islands reminds me of a little anecdote that I will repeat, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. A good minister of the established church was debating with a minister of the Universalist church as to whether or not there was a personal devil. The Universalist minister said, "I do not believe there is a personal devil; if there is I should like to see him." "Well," said his clerical friend, "brother, can't you wait?" [Laughter.] Now, let us wait. I do not think there is great haste about this matter.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator from New Hampshire willing to follow out that logic in dealing with the Philippines?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am willing to wait.

Mr. BORAH. Knowing what it will be when you get into the hands of the devil?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I do not know about that. I am willing to trust the man who succeeds me in this body, and one will in due time. I am willing to believe that he will have just as much wisdom as I have to deal with great questions like this.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can understand that; and it is a very logical and sensible position if one believes that the time has not come to act upon this matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, that is my belief.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, at this time it is no impeachment or disparagement of the judgment or intelligence of those who come after us. We have a situation. We must confront it. I can say that there is no citizen of the United States of whom I have ever heard who is willing to assert that hereafter it should be the policy of the United States to train the Filipinos to the end that they may finally become citizens of the United States and entitled to their part in the government of our hundred million people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not argue that with the Senator. The Senator assumes that we are going to make States out of Alaska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. And out of Hawaii? It is a mere assumption on the part of anybody.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is verified by our whole past. Why did we make States out of the Southern States after the Civil War?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, that was the logical result. The Senator says that he is against holding any foot of territory that can not become an integral part of the United States. Now, what is the Senator going to do with the island of Guam? Is he going to make a State out of that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have hunted a long time for the island of Guam. I believe I did find it once, but in reality I am not very familiar with it. But if Guam has people as well as territory in considerable number, everything that I am saying will apply to Guam as certainly everything I am saying applies to Porto Rico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does Tutuila trouble the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; this——

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, again, I say I think we had better wait to solve these problems as they come along.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, those who come after the Senator from New Hampshire may shield themselves in the same way. It is a difficult problem to solve, a difficult question to answer, and they will say, "Let those who come after us settle these things." In the meanwhile the purpose of the people of the United States is challenged and repudiated. The purpose of the people of this country is denied by the delay if now the time has come when we, with honor to ourselves and due regard to the people of those islands, can withdraw.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator, as he has quoted three or four great men as having suggested that we give independence to the Philippine Islands, can the Senator point to any declaration of the great party to which he belongs, as a party, or can the Senator point to any action that the American people have taken that would indicate that they are ready to scuttle the ship?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I decline to accept the terminology of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I will substitute the phrase "abandon the Philippine Islands."

Mr. CUMMINS. It is easy enough to try to disparage a suggestion by calling it the "scuttling of the ship," because there is a certain dishonor and cowardice involved in those words.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I have said, I will withdraw that language and substitute the phrase "abandon the Philippine Islands." The Republican Party has made no such declaration in its great national platforms; they have never suggested it; the Democratic Party has suggested it and got defeated every time it went before the people on that issue.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; Mr. President. I think the Senator from New Hampshire could not have been here when I began my observations, for I quoted from the Republican platform upon that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I heard that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quoted, or gave, the substance of the Democratic platform upon the subject, and I am certainly not in sympathy with the Democratic announcement. I quoted from McKinley, I quoted from Roosevelt, I quoted from Taft, and I could quote from a dozen other leading Republicans, declaring that it was not our purpose to permanently occupy the Philippine Islands, but that it was our purpose to do what we could for them; and whenever the time came when it could safely be done, to give them their independence. There has not been any other voice in the Republican Party; there has not been any other voice in the United States than that; and no man has dared to arise in this Chamber and assert any other purpose, so far as I have heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I have read President Taft's utterances correctly, he makes the suggestion that it may be a hundred years before the time will come of which the Senator from Iowa speaks.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; he did not; and I do not remember President Taft having spoken in that way. President Roosevelt, one of the wise men of his time, used the words "within a generation." Those words, however, were used years ago. President Taft said that the time would come, with our training and education, when, if the Filipinos desired it, they ought to have independence. Now, the whole inquiry is with respect to the time.

Mr. President, I believe that the Filipinos will reach their ultimate destiny, assuming it now to be a happy one, more quickly, more surely, if we now withdraw from the islands than if we retain the sovereignty over them for years to come.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator from Iowa will kindly permit me, I wish to call his attention, in connection with the matter which he is now discussing, to a joint resolution adopted by the Republican majority in the Senate a few days after the ratification of the Paris treaty, in which resolution the Republicans stated their position with reference to the future disposition of the Philippine Islands. The resolution reads:

Resolved, etc., That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

That resolution was adopted in the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, and is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session, volume 32, at page 1847. It distinctly states that it never was the intention to hold the Philippine Islands permanently.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Arkansas. I did not know that we had taken that action so definitely as he has shown. I have known, however, that it was the universal sentiment of the people.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I remember that resolution very well, having been present at the time it was considered; but does the Senator from Iowa regard that resolution as being definite?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, there is nothing definite about it except in one thing; the universality of one idea can not be denied, namely, that we have not intended to incorporate the Philippine Islands as a part of the Government of the United States, but that at some time they were to be permitted to establish their own government and to control their own destinies. I can not impress that too often or too deeply upon the minds of Senators; and I again say that the only question is one of time.

I could add nothing to the analysis of this subject made a few days ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It was so true that it was instinctively accepted by every Senator who heard it. There are differences between those people and ours that can never be eradicated and that no education can destroy; that will be accentuated rather than diminished as time goes on and as our efforts to train and control them are made. I believe this is the best time that will ever occur in the history of the Philippine Islands to withdraw from them. I believe that a withdrawal now will give them a better opportunity to achieve their victory over very difficult conditions, I agree, than though we were to withdraw 100 years hence or 50 years hence or 25 years hence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Iowa has laid great stress upon the utterances of three ex-Presidents of the United States on this question, and there seems to be a little difference of opinion between the Senator and myself as to what ex-President Taft said about the time we should continue in the Philippines. I want to call the Senator's attention to a speech delivered by ex-President Taft before the Commonwealth Club, of California, in September, 1915, considerably less than one year ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only quoted what ex-President Taft said while he was in office.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, he certainly said nothing when in office as to the date we should grant the Filipinos independence.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not as fixing a definite time.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point President Taft said in the address I have called attention to:

I am in favor of turning the islands over to their people when they are reasonably fitted for self-government.

There is the point that has been thrashed over here, as to what self-government means; and we shall not enter into that now, or, at least, I shall not. Ex-President Taft added:

But this will not be for two generations.

I believe a generation is 30 years, so that is 60 years.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was his opinion as a private citizen.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator was quoting Mr. Taft——

Mr. CUMMINS. That was not President Taft's statement when he was burdened with the responsibility of office.

Mr. GALLINGER. He made no declaration on that point at all when he was President of the United States, as I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is a path that every nation must walk toward complete and successful self-government, and it must walk that path alone, and any aid or any help that may be given to it by a superior power retards its progress rather than aids its advance.

What is the situation here? There are 7,000,000 people in the Philippine Islands who will be subject to the provisions of the bill that has been reported. I will assume, first, that one-fourth of them are men of more than 21 years of age. That makes about 1,750,000 men who, if they were citizens of this country, would be entitled to vote. Under the bill that is now reported, it is said—of course I am giving this only upon the authority of those familiar with the question—that 700,000 or 800,000 of these men will be qualified to vote; and if self-government is not now possible in a population of that kind, it will not be possible in the future, at least in that future of which we can take consideration.

I believe, Mr. President, while they may fall into disorder now and then, that while they may make many mistakes in the work they will attempt to do, they will succeed better now than after we have trained them for a quarter of a century more; for, after all, the underlying thing in every free and successful government is the spirit that demands liberty and self-government, and if that spirit is destroyed under the tutelage and control of the United States, then there will be no hope for a stable and separate government. But I have said all that I desire to say with regard to that phase of it. These considerations impel me to believe that the separation ought to be immediate and ought to be complete; and I now come very briefly to the reasons that make it impossible for me to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas and that have compelled me to offer the substitute which is now pending.

I can not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, because it vests in the President of the United States a dangerous power. It gives him more power than we have ever given to one man; more than ever ought to be given to one man. It practically gives him the power, if he desires so to use it, to become dictator, without law and without restriction, of the Philippine Islands for a period of at least nine years. There is no guide given him with respect to the plan of government which is to be established in the islands before our withdrawal; there is no guide to his discretion with respect to his right to give a guaranty on the part of the United States for the independence of the islands during the five years that may ensue after the government is established.

I am opposed to it, secondly, because it does not give the Filipino people the right to vote upon the adoption of their government upon their separation from the United States. I believe it is craven for us to attempt to withdraw our sovereignty from the Philippine Islands until the people of the Philippine Islands express their desire that we shall withdraw.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I thought I might suggest to the Senator that he was mistaken somewhat in what he is now saying, or else I misunderstand the purport of this provision of the so-called Clarke amendment. In enumerating the powers the President may exercise in describing the duties which rest upon him, it says:

> And he shall on behalf of the United States fully recognize the independence of the said Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation, and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof.

Not by him, but by the people of the Philippine Islands.

Now, I will recall to the Senator's attention the provision of the resolution adopted by the Republican majority of the Senate the day after the treaty of Paris was ratified, in which they described the kind of government they desired to see set up in the islands before they acknowledged that the time had arrived when they might be turned loose. It says:

> But it is the intention of the United States to establish on said island a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands.

That is the kind of government that the Republican Party promised them, and that is the kind of government that this amendment leaves them to adopt.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that, but upon this subject the Senator from Arkansas will remember that I began with an emancipation from the declarations of any political party. I do not intend that my vote upon this subject shall be influenced by the declaration of a political convention or the majority in the Senate at that time. I am glad the Senator from Arkansas corrected me with respect to the other matter, although I still think that I was substantially accurate in my statement. The President is given no authority, it is true, over the plan of government that shall be established, except that it must be one that will preserve the rights of the people of this country and possibly of other countries; but I am not so much concerned about that as I am in insisting that it must be a government that is adopted by a vote of the people of that country. I am not willing that a few men in the Philippines shall establish a government which shall be recognized by the President, and that we then shall withdraw. I think it is our bounden duty to see that the government which we leave there is one which, in our judgment, is calculated to be enduring, and that will protect not only our rights, but the rights of the Filipino people as well.

Let us see how it will work. The President, at the end of two years, we will say, recognizes the Filipino government, and if he does not secure a guaranty from any other country in the world with regard to Philippine independence, he will enter into an agreement of guaranty for ourselves. He must then remain there with his Army and his Navy, or with such other force as will properly represent our power and accomplish our purpose, for five years during the pendency of the agreement of guaranty. That is not separation, in my opinion. I fear at least that our relation with the Philippine Islands will be very much more unsatisfactory at the end of that time than it is now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The fact that the United States Government was standing sponsor for the independent existence of the Philippines for five years would be a sufficient guaranty to protect them without the presence of an armed force, except for the purpose of keeping internal peace. We do not maintain an army in South America nor in Cuba, nor elsewhere, in order to maintain the guaranties that are implied by the existence of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is the provision, if I may read it, in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas:

> And pending the existence of such separate guaranty by the United States, the United States shall be entitled to retain and exercise such control and supervision in the said Philippines as may be necessary to enforce order therein and to avoid external complications.

All that is with the President.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is exactly what we do in Cuba under the so-called Platt amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not responsible for the Platt amendment. I want to get out of the Philippines; I want to see a government established there, and then I want to bid that government Godspeed and sail away and have no more concern with the affairs of the Philippines thereafter than we have with any other country with which we have friendly relations.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I sympathize very completely with the purpose the Senator has stated, and if I thought I could secure the enactment of that statement into law, I should be very glad to do it. The fact is that it would represent my real opinions. But the difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself is that he wants to do something that is theoretically correct, whereas I am forced to accept the prospect of getting something that is practicable, something that is within reach, something that will get us started upon the road to a dismissal from the Philippine Islands—because I regard it as dismissing ourselves rather than dismissing the Philippine Islands. It is not a fact that the Philippine Islands will be helpless in the event that the United States shall withdraw its interference, because they will be remitted to every power that any independent government ever had to make new alliances, if, in fact, alliances are required to perpetuate the existence of that people as a separate government.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assure the Senator from Arkansas that I appreciate and believe I understand all the difficulties with which he has been surrounded. I can only wish for him better success in future efforts in opening the minds of his associates to the reasonable, defensible course to pursue. I can not believe that we ought to withdraw from the Philippines without a vote of the people of that country. I am not willing to accept the representation of one or two men sent from the Philippines that they desire separation. I can understand how their ambitions and their hopes for the future might very greatly influence their opinions. I want a vote of the 800,000 men who will be entitled under this bill to express their opinion upon public affairs; and if a majority of them vote for an independent government and for separation from the United States, then I want them to have their way. But, Mr. President, after the vote is taken, the suggestion that we ought to ask the Governments of the earth to guarantee the independence of the Philippines for a period of five years is to me unthinkable—I almost said absurd.

Why should any Government in the world join us in a guaranty of the independence of the Philippine Islands? Why? There is no reason; and if they were willing, I would not be willing to joint with them in a guaranty of that kind. Again, I summon the wisdom of the forefathers against these entangling alliances. But I have no fear, really, of entangling alliances, so far as this point is concerned, because there would be no common treaty. There are no great powers who would join us in this undertaking; and then we have given the President, in this proposed amendment, the power to execute the guaranty alone, on behalf of the United States. Why should we guarantee the independence of the Philippines for five years or for any period? If for five years, why not for a quarter of a century? It belies and condemns the very spirit out of which the amendment grew.

The Senator from Arkansas perceives that. He understands that; and I am unable to see why men who believe that the time has come when the Philippine people should establish a government of their own also believe that for a period thereafter the United States, either alone or in conjunction with any other power, should guarantee the independence of the islands.

Suppose the government that is to be established should not desire a guaranty of that sort, with whom is the contract to be made? You can not have a contract of guaranty unless there are two parties, at least, to it. Suppose your independent government that is to be established does not desire supervision of that sort—the supervision that inevitably flows from the contract of guaranty—what then? You have accomplished nothing; and I predict that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas instead of the real desire of the Senator from Arkansas is enacted into law, nine years will pass and we will not have gone from the Philippines. There will be no independent government there, and our relations will be more complicated, intricate, and difficult than they are now.

If you do not believe that an independent government, such as they desire, can be carried on in these islands with fair promise of success, then let us defer action until that time comes. I believe the time has come; and it seems to me that my Democratic friends forget the very basis of the argument they have been making when they insist that independence shall be accompanied with a guaranty and a supervision which amounts practically to sovereignty over the islands and over the government which they are seeking to establish.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. It seems to me that in considering this question we ought to draw a line of separation here, namely, whether we should enter into agreements with other powers respecting a guaranty in some form of the independence of the Philippines, or whether the United States, acting alone, should do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very clear that we ought not to do either.

Mr. STONE. I understand that to be the Senator's view; but in my mind I draw a line between our national policy of asking other nations to join us in a movement of this character or, aside from that, undertaking to guarantee their independence on our own part.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is a very clear line of distinction between the two things.

Mr. STONE. Yes; the Senator, of course, sees that. Now, we might consider those two things as separate things. We might consider one distinct and separate proposition—whether we should seek to make agreements with other powers that in some form or another guaranteed the independence of the Philippines, whether the Congress should direct the President to endeavor to do that, or, on the other hand, considering that now as a separate proposition, we might consider putting into the law the declaration that the United States alone will guarantee that independence.

Mr. CUMMINS. The difference between the two things is perfectly manifest, and the reasons which may be urged for or against the two proposals are different.

Mr. STONE. I think entirely so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would be very unwise for this Government to ask any other Government to join it in a guaranty of independence. It might not be so unwise to ask it, but it would be very unwise to accept it if it were given, for the Senator from Missouri, skilled as he is in diplomacy and in the relations of nations to each other, can easily see what trouble may follow a joint agreement of that sort.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator please, I turn my thought now to one of these suggestions—that of a mutual agreement or understanding between our Government and the other Governments, as distinct and separate from the other proposition of the United States alone guaranteeing the independence of the Philippines. As to the one to which I say my thought is now directed, I make this observation, which is in the nature of an inquiry as well as a suggestion:

Are there not two ways by which that might be approached?—the first that which is proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, that we ask other nations to agree with us to maintain the independence of the Philippine Islands against outside force—I need not elaborate on that; every Senator understands what that means; and another suggestion that we ask the cooperation of other nations, an agreement with them that so far as they are concerned, individually and separately, they will never infringe or intrude upon the independence of these islands; that they will respect the independence that we confer upon them.

I think the Senator a moment ago expressed the opinion that we would not be able to find other nations that would enter into any agreement of the one kind or the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. STONE. Well, let us see. The United States is the sovereign over the Philippines. It is a great possession. It is in the Orient. The presence of the United States there, in the form in which that presence appears, I imagine is not altogether satisfying to some of the larger nations of the world. They would be very glad, I think—some of them, at least—if we withdrew from that region of the world; for it has been asserted elsewhere as well as upon the floor of the Senate that our presence there is, in a way, an attempt on our part to extend what we call the Monroe doctrine to the Orient.

If we get out of the Orient, and please other nations in so doing, does the Senator think that in consideration of our action—let us call it a generous action, if you please, the high and ennobling act upon our part of absolutely surrendering control over a great and valuable possession and conferring independence upon the people—they would not agree at least to say that they would respect the independence of the country which had been conferred by our own, let me say again, generous act? Does the Senator think that Japan, for example, or Great Britain or Germany, would not tell us, "If you do this magnificent thing, this almost unexampled thing, we will respect the thing you have done and we will not interfere with it," just as was done on one occasion with respect to the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the view taken by the Senator from Missouri does very great credit to his confidence in the justice of the nations, but I am still skeptical about it. I do not believe, so far as one can see at this moment, that any nation will attempt to overthrow the independence of the government established in the Philippine Islands. I can not see any temptation, or serious temptation, which is presented to any nation that would lead it into a war of conquest, but a nation is usually unwilling to bind itself by an agreement that will circumscribe and limit its energies and its power unless there is some consideration for it, unless broadly or narrowly it has compensation for it.

I am very sure that the great powers of the world would not agree to defend the Philippines; that is to say, they would not agree to go to war with any other nation with which they might be entirely at peace and on the most amiable terms in order to defend the independence of the Philippines. I am not so sure that some nations might not agree to respect the independence of the Philippines, but that of course is not this amendment. That was the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], which was voted upon adversely. I, however, would be very reluctant to see the United States become the guarantor in the event that other nations would not make the agreement proposed in the amendment. We never would get out of the Philippines. They will have their troubles. They are bound to have their troubles. Every nation in the world has its troubles.

Remember what happened in the United States. The Senator from Missouri will remember that after the War of the Revolution closed there were four, five, six years of chaos and disorder when the most enthusiastic and optimistic and earnest patriots believed that the war had been in vain. It was only by the overpowering greatness of one man that we finally emerged into the Constitution and Government that has been so stable and successful. If a country like ours had to meet these discords and dissensions and revolts, what may be expected of the diverse population that now occupies those islands? Of course, there will be difficulties, of course there will be disorders, but happily they will not overturn the government that we hope to see established. But if the United States is there with its Army, with its power, to calm and quell, to overcome, the Philippine government will never be more than a mere technical and paper establishment, contributing little or nothing to the happiness of its people.

No, Mr. President, if the time has come to separate from the Philippines, and I believe that it has come, our duty is first to cooperate and collaborate with the Philippine Legislature in the formation of a plan of government and constitution; and when that plan or constitution receives the concurrence of the commissioners to be appointed by the United States and the Philippine Legislature as constituted in this bill, then it will be submitted to a vote of the men who under this bill are given the right to vote, and if the constitution or plan receives the approval of the people, then the government being established, we shall bid them good-by and Godspeed, and thereafter deal with that government precisely as we deal with all other independent nationalities or Governments in the world. That is the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. STONE. I am under the belief that any further discussion of this subject is somewhat a waste of time; that considered from the point of view of discussion it is not likely to change or affect the opinions of Senators. It looks to me as if interest has been largely lost in the discussion. I think the Senator from Iowa appreciates that view. I am sorry it is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am like a noted man who was about to visit a friend to secure a drink. When asked by another what his emotions were, he said, "This friend has two brands of whisky; one very good and the other very bad. I always go there hoping for the best but expecting the worst." [Laughter.] Whenever I address my Democratic friends after they have either formally or informally, in caucus or conference, agreed upon a measure, I really have not that high-glowing hope of changing their minds that I had when I was younger. While hoping for the best, I really am expecting the worst.

Mr. STONE. I am rather sorry the Senator made his last remark. It was hardly justified by the circumstances.

Mr. CUMMINS. No? I have been told by many of the Senators upon your side of the Chamber that my amendment could not pass. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not take what I said seriously, however.

Mr. STONE. I usually take what the Senator says seriously. I am glad he assures us that in what he just said he was not serious. I think the consideration of this measure ought to be taken seriously.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I am sure there never was a more important and serious one.

Mr. STONE. I do not think, Mr. President, that we are going to engage upon legislation likely to be of greater importance. When I said that I thought further discussion was in a large measure without value, I had no thought of the subject in any partisan aspect. The Senator from Iowa need only to look around him to convince him that the interest in the discussion lags as well upon that side as this, for if any Senator upon that side could bring his party colleagues to listen to a subject to which he has been devoting his attention, I should think it would be the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President, I hardly compliment myself so much as that. It is perfectly manifest, and I know it to be true, that a great many of my party associates do not look upon me as orthodox upon this question. I have tried to treat it, and I intend to treat it in the future, in a nonpartisan spirit. I have given my view upon the subject with absolute frankness, without regard——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I intended to say when I was on the floor a moment ago by the courtesy of the Senator that making an arrangement with foreign powers might depend, and I think would depend, upon the time when the attempt to make the arrangement was made. I agree with what some other Senators have said; indeed, I have so said myself——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. STONE. In just a moment. I have said myself that if we postpone the effort to make an arrangement looking to the neutrality of the islands until after we have conferred independence upon them, there would be no reason that I can see why any other nation should care to enter into such arrangement; but if we made our recognition of the Philippines and our action looking to the conferring of independence upon them conditional upon or in some way dependent upon the agreement by which their independence would be guaranteed on the one hand, as provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas or respected and observed, upon the other hand, by these foreign powers, as I have suggested, I think we would have a better chance to come to some agreement with them.

I expect to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as I have already said, although I am not well satisfied with its provisions. I would be glad to have some changes in it, but I am going the full length of that amendment, if need be, to do the thing I am so profoundly anxious to do—to grant independence to the Philippines.

Mr. CUMMINS. Might I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that I have about finished?

Mr. STONE. But I wish to ask the Senator about his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, the Senator desires to ask a question.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I wish to ask the Senator some questions about the amendment he has offered. I think there is a very great deal of real merit in this amendment. I look upon it with some favor. I do not know what the Senate is going to do about it. The Senator said a moment ago that it had been passed around in some informal way that it was not to be agreed to. I know nothing about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I explain that? I desire to say that I have had quite as much encouragement for it upon the Senator's side of the Chamber as I have upon my own. I did not intend to confine my suggestion to one side. I still hope that it will pass.

Mr. STONE. The Senator does not speak as if he had a very intense hope.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been doing my best. I have been standing here for two hours now.

Mr. STONE. I know; the Senator has made a great speech; but now the Senator informs us that he has very little hope. He is hoping rather against hope.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. His amendment provides that the President shall be authorized and directed to appoint, with the consent of the Senate, three commissioners who shall cooperate with the Philippine Legislature in preparing and submitting a constitution or plan of government for the people of the Philippine Islands. The three commissioners are to cooperate with the Legislature of the Philippine Islands. How does the Senator expect them to cooperate? Suppose the commissioners and the legislature disagree as to the constitution or plan of government, will it fall to the ground and will that be the end of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would happen then precisely as would happen under the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, if the President did not accept the constitution or plan prepared.

Mr. STONE. I do not now care for a comparison between one amendment and another.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true. The President appoints three commissioners to cooperate with the Philippine Legislature. The Philippine Legislature initiates the constitution and submits it to the three commissioners. If the commissioners, or a majority of them, within the limits and within the scope of the authority that is prescribed in the amendment approve it, then it is submitted to the Philippine people. If they do not approve of it, it is not submitted, and Congress would have to act again or the President would appoint three other commissioners.

Mr. STONE. Would it not be better, if this plan should be agreed to, to put a controlling power somewhere? For example, why not let the Legislature of the Philippines, representing the best intelligence of that people, line out their constitution and plan of government and submit that to the people of the islands? Whether or not, following that, the approval of the matter should be referred back to the Congress of the United States is another question; but if it is a constitution and government which the Legislature of the Philippines approve, and being submitted to the qualified voters of the islands is approved by them, what more have we to do with that?

Mr. CUMMINS. There would be no great objection to that plan. I preferred this one because I thought it would be more practical and believed that it would result in a constitution that would preserve their independence and maintain order and stable affairs in the islands. But I would have no great objection to the other plan.

Mr. STONE. That plan, it seems to me, would be really the only practical one; the other would put two forces in operation that would be independent and yet coordinate. One might desire a certain constitution and plan of government and the other be wholly opposed to that. It seems to me, if the Senator please, in going through this, if his idea should prevail, the people who are concerned, who are to live under the constitution and administer it, who are to live under the government and be subject to its sovereignty and laws, are the people who ought to make the form of government, and if it should be a government agreeable to them and which they preferred, why should we here, 7,000 miles away, undertake to interfere with that popular choice?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Missouri that I desire to close my argument and take my seat, because really I have already occupied the time of the Senate much too long.

Mr. STONE. I have no wish to detain the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to answer the question just proposed by the Senator from Missouri and then I hope that he will make any further criticism of my amendment the subject of his own remarks.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that after that I shall not make any further remarks in his time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that abstractly what he has just stated is true, and it would be true under my amendment. The people of the Philippine Islands have the right to determine what government they shall establish. But I think there is a duty on the part of the United States to see that the government of the Philippine Islands shall begin with due regard to the fundamental principles of organized society, and therefore these commissioners, I think, fairly representing the President who appoints them, and fairly representing the people of the United States, because the Senate is to confirm them, would exercise a wise and just discretion in approving or refusing to approve the proposed constitution. If they approve it, it is submitted and the people can either accept it or reject it, according to their desire.

Mr. President, I feel that I must apologize to all Senators for occupying so much time, although it is well known that I have used but a small part of it. I understand the difficulty of this subject. I thoroughly believe in the sincerity and honesty of purpose of all Senators, differing as they do with respect to it. I have no doubt that each of them will vote as his conscience tells him to vote, having just one thing in mind, namely, the welfare of the people of the Philippine Islands and the conscience of the men and women who make up the Republic of the United States.

I am praying, I am hoping that what is done here will be done to the credit and honor not only of the American name but for the welfare of the 7,000,000 of people we are now attempting to control and govern.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I wish to get his viewpoint as nearly correct as I possibly can. I have listened to his argument and I have also read over his amendment. I wish to ask the Senator if he contends or takes the position that if the Filipino people should desire us to remain and by their vote express a desire to remain a part of the United States, and if the people of the United States should be convinced that it was to our own interest to abandon Asiatic possessions, we should be in duty bound to retain them just as long as they desired to be under our protection?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have attempted to state my view of that matter heretofore. I do not attempt to bind, or would not suggest binding, the future. What I do say is that if the Filipino people at this time desire to maintain their relations with the Government of the United States, we can not abandon them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose they would want to do it 10 years from now, or 20 years from now, would the Senator think that we should still allow them to govern the hundred million——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not express an opinion on that. I do not assert it as a principle governing a long period of years. I only say that I believe the time has come when we in honor and with due regard to all our obligations can leave the Philippine Islands subject to one thing, namely, their desire to retain their relation to us. What the conditions may be years hence I am not able even to imagine. I do not assert, of course, that for all time to come the 100,000,000 people within the territory of the United States must be subordinated to the 7,000,000 people in the Philippine Islands. I only assert that we went there in 1898; that we conquered the Philippine Islands and imposed our government upon them; and that without their consent, in my judgment, the time has not come to separate ourselves from them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator, Mr. President. I think I understand his position quite well. If, however, in his own judgment, and that judgment is backed by the opinion of the American people, as he believes it is, that we should now sever our relations with the Philippine people, I can not understand why he could also take the position that that should be subject to the whim or to the belief of the Filipino people that they wish to remain with us for any length of time, either in perpetuity or for 10 years or for 20 years. It does seem to me that we are in a position where we ought to determine, from the standpoint of the United States, whether we ought to get out of the Philippines, and not leave it to the judgment of any people or of any other nation upon the face of the earth.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I could cheerfully support this amendment except for one thing. There could be no objection, perhaps, to appointing commissioners to cooperate by way of advice and consultation with the Philippine Legislature; but the amendment as it is now leaves it absolutely in the power of a majority of those three commissioners to indefinitely prevent the independence of the Philippine people, for the constitution planned by the legislature will have to be approved by the commissioners or by a majority of them. It does seem to me that, with the guiding influence of the commissioners and the tutelage of 17 years, recognizing the difference in the character and makeup of their people and ours, if we are going to grant them independence, we ought, in the last analysis, to leave it absolutely in their power to determine what their constitution shall be, inasmuch as no constitution imposed by us would prevent them from afterwards making their constitution according to their own views. It simply leaves it in the power of two men, if they were captious, to indefinitely postpone their independence. Of course I recognize that the differences are very vital ones, but I want to ask the Senator if he would be willing to eliminate the provision which requires the approval of a majority of the commissioners?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize the general justice of the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota; but I am myself unwilling to abandon, if you please, the Philippines without some supervision over the character of the government that shall be there established. For instance, suppose the Filipino people wanted to establish a military dictatorship, not dependent upon the vote of the people at all, I would not be willing to withdraw the sovereignty of the United States in favor of a government of that kind, even though it might be said abstractly that it was the government the people of the islands wanted. I think we have just that obligation toward them, of exercising our judgment, not with respect to what would be best for us, but with respect to what would be best adapted for them before we leave them to care for themselves.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that might be if there were any way by which we, with our 125 years or more of experience in self-government, with reference to some great fundamental of free government, could permanently read into their constitution some such great fundamentals; but we could not do that. The moment they once became independent under any form of constitution they themselves could amend the constitution. We may force those people, just as we forced the people of Arizona, to accept a constitution that we knew they did not want and which they would not maintain, and which they modified the moment they got beyond the leading strings of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the representatives of the United States would act with wisdom and with justice. Any other plan ought to be just in two lines, namely, commanding the President to-morrow to move out of the Philippines, before they have any government at all. Why do we wait there until there is any government?

Mr. CLAPP. Until there is some organized government——

Mr. CUMMINS. But why?

Mr. CLAPP. With which we can treat.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, why?

Mr. CLAPP. We would want to treat with somebody.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; and therefore it seems to me that our full obligation will not be discharged unless in the formation of that government the fundamental principles of humanity and of modern affairs are recognized. Much as I am in favor of separation, I would not be in favor of withdrawing our power in favor of a dictator.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but the Senator does, so far as he as a Senator of the United States is concerned, absolutely and forever withdraw his authority when this proposed law is passed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; our obligation.

Mr. CLAPP. No; it is not our obligation then. It then is vested in three men, two of whom constitute a majority. They may dictate to those people the kind of constitution that they must start under, even though they are not favorable to it, even though they must practice duplicity in the apparent acquiescence in it, so as to get themselves into a status where they can then frame a government to suit themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I very much regret, of course, that my amendment does no commend itself to the Senator from Minnesota. I have drawn it in a way that I think will be best adapted to accomplish the result.

Mr. CLAPP. I will tell the Senator why I have my doubts as to the amendment. The Senator says we must not assume that anything of that kind will happen. The Senator was a member of this body, as I was, when a people about to become a part of the United States had overwhelmingly expressed themselves upon a great fundamental question; but they were forced to go back to the ratification of a constitution striking out that proposition, when everybody knew the moment they got away from our leading strings that in the adoption of a new constitution they would immediately reassert their views in that new constitution. We forced a great number of men about to become citizens of the United States to purchase the right to be a part of this Union by the exercise of duplicity. They had to surrender temporarily, and without any intention of a permanent surrender, their convictions upon a great fundamental question.

I am not in favor of putting it in the power of three men to either indefinitely hold up the independence of the Philippines or to require those people to adopt something which they do not want and which they will not retain the moment they get free.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in my opinion, it is the only practicable way, notwithstanding the unfortunate incident referred to by the Senator from Minnesota. I suppose the Senator would not be in favor of withdrawing all power on the part of Congress with regard to the admission of a State, and allow the State to be admitted no matter what sort of constitution it adoped.

Mr. CLAPP. Not at all, because the proposed State becomes an integral part of our own Government and our own Union.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the principle is just the same. We are dissolving our relations with that country instead of forming them, and it seems to me we ought to exercise some care in that dissolution. Otherwise we ought simply to pass a law that would require the President five months or two months hence to withdraw all our representatives and forces there, without regard to the question of whether a government had been established or not.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; not at all. I think the idea of appointing three commissioners, with the experience of our public history behind us, to cooperate with them and advise, suggest, and counsel would be good; but the Senator forgets that the moment this amendment is adopted and becomes a law, that moment the Senator is as powerless to say what the constitution of those islands shall be as would be one of the employees of this body.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. CLAPP. It is thrown entirely into the hands of three men, two of whom constitute a majority, and Congress has nothing left, the Senator has no more voice; and yet we leave the matter to two men.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. Unless the Senator from North Dakota desires to ask me a question, I am through.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask the Senator a question. The Senator from Minnesota is a member of the Committee on the Philippines. I want to ask him if there was presented to the committee any testimony indicating that more than about 10 per cent of the Philippine people were able to read and write?

Mr. CLAPP. Not quite 10 per cent of the entire population—men, women, and children—could do so; but over one-half of what would become the electorate under this bill can read and write.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator think it will be possible to set up, even if the United States should attempt to set up, a form of government for a class of people who are unable to read or write or who are without any education whatever? Does the Senator believe that it would be possible for a people of that kind to maintain the kind of government that we should like to see them maintain?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know whether they would maintain the kind of government we would like to see. We had to go to work after the adoption of our own Constitution and absolutely reverse the original Constitution in four great particulars, every one of them fundamental. We had to go through the greatest insurrection the world ever knew before we reached our present condition of unity and harmony as a people. We had to see the great cities of this country, from San Francisco to New York, locked in the embrace of mobs and terrorized by mobs. I do not know what the success of the Filipino people will be; but I believe that the Filipino people are perfectly competent to govern themselves under the form of government best suited and best adapted to their temperament and conditions.

Mr. GRONNA. Does not this bill indicate that we shall set up a republican form of government?

Mr. CLAPP. This bill indicates not our desire as to what they shall do, but authorizes and directs that there shall be a republican form of government. It does not leave it to the people. We prescribe the form of government in the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. There being only about 10 per cent of the people educated and fit to maintain a government, is it not reasonable to believe that the only kind of government that they could maintain would be an aristocracy or oligarchy; that it would be a government controlled absolutely by a few or by those best fitted to carry on a government?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is not so very long ago that a former Member of this body in a public speech in the city of Albany deplored the fact that the great State of New York, after one hundred and twenty odd years of experiment, had been governed by what was first so graphically described by the late Senator Dolliver, which he characterized as an "invisible government." Governments will always be in the hands of some one. There may not be a population where there is the equation of a high plane of what we call school education, but the sense of right, the sense of justice, the sense of protecting people and seeking to get away from wrong and injustice may find a lodgment in a man's heart and mind although he does not bear the right to attach the title or degree of doctor of laws to his name. It is not a question of book learning; it is a question of the character and intelligence generally of the people.

While we have made great progress, while we may well be proud of our history, we have seen that we have ulcers and cancerous spots in the body politic. It is insisted by some that the Filipinos before they undertake the experiment of self-government must demonstrate that they can have a government free from these cancers and these ulcers. Of course in the Philippine Islands, as in every State in this Union, as in the Nation at large, certain men will become leaders, and I would hope that they would be leaders by power and virtue of mentality, by the power and virtue of their intelligence. More than 10 per cent of the electorate are able to read and write. The Senator from North Dakota had reference to 10 per cent of the entire population.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that when we decide to let the Philippine people go we should adopt some plan whereby, in the last analysis, either those people or this Congress should determine whether the law should be operative.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLAPP. I am through, unless the Senator desires to ask a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. It is this, Mr. President: Is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa now pending subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment. On page 1 strike out lines 11 and 12 and lines 1 and 2 on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On pages 1 and 2 it is proposed to strike out the following words:

> Among other things, it shall provide for the complete possession and sovereignty on the part of the United States, in perpetuity, of such coaling stations and naval bases as may be prescribed by the President of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this question has been very thoroughly discussed, and I do not care to detain the Senate more than a few moments by what I have to say; I desire to speak briefly merely in order to give my reasons for the votes which I shall cast.

I happened to be for many years chairman of the Committee on the Philippines and took a very great interest in all the legislation that was passed and everything that was done in regard to the islands when they first came into our hands. I had a large part in drafting the organic act, which, on the whole, I think has worked well as a constitution for those islands.

It seems to me—and I have always been of the opinion—that there are only two courses to be pursued in regard to the Philippine Islands. One is to abandon them entirely, give them their independence, and separate ourselves from them wholly; the other is to remain in control of the islands as we now are. The one situation of all others which I think we ought to avoid is to put ourselves in a position where we shall be responsible for those islands and yet have no power over them.

Of late the war in Europe has brought home very strongly, I think, to everyone's mind the military weakness involved in our possession of the Philippine Islands. A strong argument can be made in favor of complete abandonment and withdrawal from the islands based on the fact that they are a source of military weakness to the United States, and a strong argument in opposition can be made on the basis of our duty and obligation to those people to retain and administer the islands as we have been doing. One thing is certain, if we are to withdraw from those islands, the withdrawal ought to be complete. No mistake would be so great as a halfway measure.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], it seems to me, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], is defective in the fact that it does not do what it proposes to do. It puts us in the position of guaranteeing the safety of those islands for four years, and yet giving up our control. It also opens the door by the proviso, as I understand, to a return to our present situation. It does not, in fact, settle anything. If we are to go, we ought to go; and if we are to stay, we ought to stay and keep the power. Power without responsibility is bad; but responsibility without power is even worse.

Whether or not the Philippine people are fit for what we call self-government or for independence, they are certainly not in a condition where we can afford to put ourselves in such a relation to them that they can involve us in all sorts of difficulties and troubles, both with other nations and in the islands themselves, while we at the same time are deprived of all power to prevent it. In other words, if we are to go, let us go; and if we are to stay, let us stay with power in our hands so long as we are responsible. My own belief is that we have an obligation to those people which makes it a great dereliction of national duty to abandon them at this time; but if, as is argued here, they are so entirely fitted for self-government, then they are fit for the necessary accompaniment of self-government, which is complete independence.

What I most object to is our undertaking to give a guaranty to protect those islands and leave the people of those islands to do anything they please. The people of the Philippine Islands are nearly all Malays or of the Malay race. There are, of course, now considerable bodies of Spanish and Chinese mestizos there, but, broadly speaking, they are Malays.

The Spaniards divided the people of the Philippines, not on ethnical principles, but according to their religious beliefs. They called those who had accepted Christianity "Filipinos"; they called the wild tribes "infieles" or heathens, and they called the Mohammedans "Moros" or "Moors." Of course, they were not Moors; they were simply Mohammedan Malays of the same race as the rest; but they divided them in that way; and then there were the aborigines, a smaller number of people, known as the Negritos. Of the last there are not more than 25,000, so that they constitute a negligible element; but there is a very large element of the wild tribes, some 600,000 of them. There are 200,000 of them, according to the statistics, in the island of Luzon alone. Now, those people and the Moros will, under this bill, be left practically, if we remain responsible and exercise no power, to be dealt with by that portion of the Filipinos who have the actual legislative authority. I do not think we ought to leave those people, so long as we have any connection with the islands, in any such way. I do not think we ought to make ourselves responsible for what the Filipino legislature may see fit to do and not have the power to control their action. I do not myself think that the Filipinos are fitted for self-government according to our theory of what self-government is.

The English-speaking people have been, in round numbers, a thousand years working up to the stage of self-government which we possess and which some other people possess, and I am not sure that we have made such a very brilliant success of it that we can assert with confidence that another people, to whom all those ideas are new, can reach that same point in 20 years.

There is the view of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that a people have the right to misgovern themselves in their own way. It may be misgovernment according to our ideas, but they have a right to misgovern themselves in their own way. I quite accede to that theory. I do not dispute it. I think we have a right to misgovern ourselves, and we occasionally do so very badly. But that is another proposition. As to the capacity of the Filipinos for self-government, and for independence—which ought to go with self-government—I have very grave doubts. But the one point I wish to reiterate and press home is this: It is one thing for them to have the right to govern or misgovern themselves in their own way, or the right to independence. It is quite another thing to make us responsible for the way they govern or misgovern themselves.

If we are going to take responsibility, we must have power. If we are going to be responsible for the people of those islands in their relations to each other, and still more in their relations to the rest of the world, we must have power there ourselves. We can not afford to put ourselves in the position of being responsible for any people and yet have no power to control what they do.

Putting aside the question whether we ought as a matter of national obligation still to remain in the islands, and taking it on the question of abandonment and withdrawal, my objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] as it stands is that it leaves us guaranteeing the islands in regard to all the rest of the world and with no sufficient control over their actions. In the course of four years they might easily embroil us and involve us in very serious trouble with other nations. If we are to remain, then we still ought to exercise the power, out of deference to the different elements of the population in the Philippines, as well as in regard to their relations to other nations.

For these reasons I do not feel able to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, nor do I feel able to vote for the bill, for I think the bill simply weakens the control which we ought to have if we are to be responsible for the islands in any measure, and I see no object in weakening that control. Least of all do I believe in the preamble. I do not like preambles to statutes in any case. A statute ought sufficiently to declare its purposes, without having a "whereas" at the beginning, and the preamble to this bill is simply another vague promise as to the future, injurious, as all vague promises of that sort are.

As it appears to me, the best way is to leave the islands just as they are, and I shall vote in that sense. But if we are not to leave them as they are—if the plan is to go—then let us really go and leave them their independence, after having made proper provision, of course, for the protection of those Americans who have acquired property rights there and invested money there—the protection of our own people. After having made proper provision of that kind, let us go and leave them independent. Let us at least have the military and other benefits of complete adandonment. The people of those islands have not shown a degree of gratitude to us for all we have done—and I think we have done an immense deal for them—they have not shown any degree of gratitude which tends to soften my heart particularly if we decide to leave them; but do not let us take any half-way measures about it. Whatever we do, let it be decisive. If we are to continue as we are, let us continue as we are—responsible for their government and controlling their government—so far as necessary. If we are going to go, let us go and leave them independent to find their own way. If they really are what they are described to be by enthusiasts here, so admirably equipped for self-government, then they are able to be independent. But whatever we do, let us avoid getting into that worst of all positions of having a great and dangerous responsibility and no power to control the people for whom we are responsible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this amendment. I have already discussed it. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the effect of this amendment is to strike out of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa the provision requiring the President, when the islands are turned over, to retain a naval base, or naval bases, as they are described, and coaling stations; so that if the amendment prevails, and the islands are turned over to the Filipinos, we will retain neither a naval base nor a coaling station.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Gronna	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harding	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.

Gallinger	McCumber	Simmons

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are ordered, I hold in my hand a letter received last evening from the present head of the department of journalism of the State University of South Dakota. This gentleman has spent two years in the Philippine Islands as a political reporter for one of the Manila papers. He is known as a very competent, able man, and a keen observer of men and affairs; and I should like to have this letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
Vermilion, January 29, 1916.

Senator THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR STERLING: I thought from the progress on the Philippine bill during the last session of Congress that the Philippine question was going to be settled with foresight. I thought so particularly after the war had shown us pretty conclusively that nations are moved by the nonmoral force of self-interest. It has been surprising to me, therefore, to find Senator HITCHCOCK proposing his four-year limit to United States sovereignty in the Philippines, and proposing it without much seeming opposition. From Senator BORAH'S remarks there seems to be a general disposition to unload the Philippines before they get us into trouble, regardless of what happens to them. I was for two years (at the time when Gov. Gen. Harrison and his cohorts came into power) political reporter for the Manila Times and I am interested in the situation. At the risk of presuming on your time I wanted to ask you about the situation in Congress on the Philippine bill. I am planning on writing some articles in the State papers on the question. Does it seem to you that the islands are going by the board? I should like to know also how you and Senator JOHNSON stand on the question.

It seems to me that a proposition of neutralization of the Philippines by various powers is folly. We have seen how that has worked in the cases of Belgium and the Balkan States. And the trouble with it in the case of the Philippines is that it does not free us of responsibility, as some of the Congressmen seem to think. It leaves us with the same responsibility and at the same time makes us clear out and leave the Philippines free for all kinds of trouble making on the part of different factions inside and of such powers as Japan without. For even if the various powers do agree to guarantee the independence of the Philippines, the United States will have to be the real guardian of Philippine rights still, and then when any of the powers sees it to its interest to muss things up the United States will be morally bound to interfere or be eternally dishonored. Neutralization has not proved very efficient in Europe; it certainly will prove disastrous "east of Suez" where "there ain't no 10 commandments" and where international intrigue is rampant.

It seems to me that the fate of the open door of China is sufficient proof of what will happen in the Philippines if we leave them as a prey. Our open-door policy certainly had come to be considered a fundamental American foreign policy—freedom of opportunity in trade in China for all and the integrity of Chinese territory. Japan has violated that policy time out of hand, and smilingly tells the American people that she has not, relying upon their ignorance of foreign affairs to put it across. But the evidence is plentiful. Now, if we establish the independence of the Philippines, Japan will surely begin her game in the archipelago, violating in petty ways at first the neutralization agreement, trying us out to see how far we will go. Then it will be a case of backing down and turning them over to Japan, which seems to me dishonorable. We lose our only trade outpost. I shouldn't say that is the biggest argument, however. We have taken the Philippines as wards; we have embarked upon a wonderful experiment in government; we are in the Far East extending the principles of equality of opportunity. We have a real mission out there. That is what makes me wonder how Congressmen can go ahead to cut the thing short when it hasn't been given a fair trial and when there are a long train of serious consequences coming with independence.

I had not meant to go into the question when I started this letter to you. But I feel strongly in the matter and hope that Congress does not make the serious blunder of launching this little bamboo ship of state, which surely can not yet resist the buffeting of the high seas.

Yours, very truly,

ALFRED M. BRACE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise on a very small matter—a matter of wording. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska in charge of the bill [Mr. HITCHCOCK] if there is not an error in the wording on page 5, lines 9 and 10? The words "sectarian institutions" ought, it seems to me, to come after the words "sect, church, denomination," so as to read "sect, church, denomination, sectarian institution, or system of religion"; and the words "as such" are obviously intended to apply only to clergymen. I suggest that simply to make it read properly, that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is, the Senator thinks the words "as such" should be stricken from line 10 and inserted in line 9?

Mr. LODGE. No; I think the words "sectarian institutions" ought to come above, with "church, denomination, or system of religion." The words "as such" evidently apply to the clergymen. You can hardly say "church, as such," or "sectarian institution, as such."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would require the insertion of the words "as such" after the word "dignitary," striking it out after the word "institution."

Mr. LODGE. I suggest, merely as the simplest way of getting at it, to strike out the words "or sectarian institution," in lines 9 and 10, and insert them after the word "denomination," in line 7.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will consider that. I suppose, at the present time, we have to dispose of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, if the Senator will simply bear it in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has called for the yeas and nays on his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. In his absence I will withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. I should like to ask what the question is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to strike out lines 11 and 12 on page 1 of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I understand that the senior Senator from Michigan, who is absent, has a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire to have this announcement stand on all votes for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair, however, to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and having made the transfer will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair, heretofore announced, to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on official business.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. OLIVER (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote, having a general pair with him.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote, having a pair with him.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Borah	Husting	Lane	Thomas
Clapp	Johnson, S. Dak.	McCumber	Vardaman
Gronna	Kenyon	Norris

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. To perfect the amendment which I have offered, I desire to insert in line 1, page 2, after the word "bases," the words "if any." I do this in order to make it perfectly clear that it is not compulsory upon the President to retain coaling stations or naval bases if he thinks the welfare of the country does not require it. I intend to leave it in his discretion.

I also ask to insert, after the word "them," in line 6, page 2, the words "or by the Congress of the United States." That is for this purpose: If the commissioners shall not approve the constitution or plan adopted by the Philippine Legislature, then Congress may approve it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that it be read as it would read if the amendment were modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read that paragraph of the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Among other things, it shall provide for the complete possession and sovereignty on the part of the United States, in perpetuity, of such coaling stations and naval bases, if any, as may be prescribed by the President of the United States. The said constitution or plan of government shall be prepared by the Philippine Legislature and submitted to the said commissioners, and if approved by the said commissioners, or a majority of them, or by the Congress of the United States, and adopted by the said legislature, it shall then be submitted to the qualified electors of the Philippine Islands for approval or rejection at an election to be appointed by the Philippine Legislature after not less than four months' notice.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the question is taken whether the yeas and nays shall be ordered, I wish to say just one word about the pending amendment and a word about the bill. It will not take more than three minutes, I should think.

I am inclined to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, because if the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands shall decide that they want to separate, it does get us out of the position in which we are at present. It does one thing or the other. I would not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as a separate proposition. I would not vote for the amendment if it was attached to the bill. I would not vote for the bill with the amendment upon it. I want it distinctly understood that in casting my vote for this amendment I do it as taking what I consider to be the lesser of the two evils.

Mr. President, in relation to the bill, I think if the preamble could be gotten rid of I should be inclined to vote for the bill; but the parliamentary situation, if I understand it correctly, is that the bill must be voted upon first, and, if the bill is passed, then the question comes upon the adoption of the preamble. I am perfectly certain if I contribute to the passage of the bill the preamble will then be put upon the bill in spite of any protest that I should make. Therefore I should be recorded in favor of a bill in which I did not believe, when it had the preamble attached to it.

I will state the reason why I am opposed to the preamble. I can not conceive that it will serve any useful purpose. I do not think the question of Philippine independence could have possibly been raised at a more inopportune time than the present. I think the world is in no condition for us to make a declaration about the Philippine Islands or their independence. I do not believe the Philippine people would be at present able to maintain an independent government if we gave it to them. I think such a mention of the question of independence as is involved in the preamble will be utilized by people having ulterior motives in the Philippine Islands, by demagogues and local politicians, to stir up all sorts of strife and trouble there and to excite all sorts of unjustifiable expectations on the part of the people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, while I regret that we ever went to the Philippine Islands, I think the course of our public officials, of our Congress, and of the speeches of our public men throughout those islands and this country do involve us in a pretty definite moral obligation not to abandon them, and especially not to abandon them for some of the reasons that have been urged upon this floor as justifying such abandonment. I think we should all feel very much ashamed—I know I would—if, after having voted for this bill, within a year or two we should see the Filipinos fall into a state of anarchy and the great work that I believe we have done in that country all torn to pieces. I think that in history we would not stand well. I do not think this great, powerful Nation would gain any glory in regard to those people, whom we have described repeatedly as our wards and for whom we have legislated as though we were their trustees, by deliberately abandoning them to their own devices at this time of their development. I am confident they would be unable to maintain any civilization one would recognize or characterize as a stable government. I think if they were let alone by the other powers of the world they would revert into an uncivilized form of government. Whether they did or not, I think they would soon be subjected to the influences of more powerful nations far removed from us. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that whatever we do we should never withdraw power and control and guidance and then continue to assume responsibility.

I shall therefore vote against all the amendments that I am acquainted with which have been so far proposed to the bill, except the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and I shall vote against the bill and against the preamble.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] because I believe in the sentiment that if we let the Philippine Islands go we should assume no further responsibility. I can not vote for the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], for two reasons. In the first place, Mr. President, I believe that the Filipino people are unfit for self-government. In the hearings, which I have read to some extent, the fact is disclosed to me that the small percentage of 10 per cent of the Filipinos are able to read and write. We therefore can not hope that the people of those islands would be able to set up a form of government such as we would desire they should set up. The only kind of government they could have in the Philippine Islands, according to the testimony as I have read it, would be an aristocracy, a government by a few, an oligarchy.

It has been said during the debate on this floor that to a certain extent we have that form in this country, but that is a different proposition, Mr. President. The people of this country can read and write; the people of this country know what form of government they desire. It is not so with the Philippine people. What good would it do to leave it to the people of the Philippine Islands to say what kind of a government they want so long as they are unfit for self-government? I think a majority of them have no conception of what government is or what representative government means.

Another reason why I shall vote against this amendment is this: I believe it is unfair to the President of the United States to say that he shall decide whether or not we shall maintain a naval base or a coaling station in the islands. The Congress of the United States ought to be courageous enough and it ought to be willing to say whether or not we should maintain in the islands a coaling station for the United States.

I think, Mr. President, we have learned a lesson from the country south of us—Mexico. It might be said that those people are not fit for self-government. I do not believe they are fit for a government as a democracy.

Mr. President, I am one of those who have said very little about Mexico. I have refrained from speaking about the conditions in Mexico, because I believe the President of the United States is right in taking the position he has taken that we shall not interfere in the affairs or with the conditions of Mexico. For that reason I have remained silent.

But with reference to this bill, Mr. President, I feel that the people of the United States have an obligation to perform. We are morally responsible for the welfare of the Filipino people, and we can not say that those people are fit to govern themselves. If they are fit for self-government, let us give them their independence now. If they are not fit for it, it is our duty to hold the islands until such time as the Filipinos may be able to govern themselves.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have a brief statement as to the cost of the Philippine Islands to this Government. There has been a good deal said about the cost. This memorandum was prepared by the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

The administration of the civil government in the Philippine Islands does not cost this Government a cent. It is entirely self-supporting. The only cost this Government has ever been to in the Philippines, aside from the Army and Navy establishment, was one-half the upkeep of the Coast and Geodetic Survey work around the islands, which runs something over $150,000 a year and has never been over $200,000 a year.

There has also been an appropriation by this Government of $3,000,000 for the relief of suffering on account of famine in the Philippine Islands. These are the only costs the Philippine Islands have been to the United States aside from the cost of the Army and Navy. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] says, "How about the coast defenses?" They are a part of the Army and Navy establishment.

A good deal of reference has been made to the great expense in the past and the great number of lives that have been lost, as though if we granted independence to the Philippine Islands some of that cost would be recovered or some of the soldiers who have been sacrificed brought to life again. Of course, that all belongs to irrevocable history and can not be relevant in the decision of this question.

There is one other point, Mr. President, I should like to call attention to before the vote is taken. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] the other day called particular attention to the island of Mindanao and to the situation in which the so-called Moros in that island would find themselves upon the passage of this bill. He put into the RECORD some statements upon very good authority indicating that a state of civil war would exist and that a continuous and almost perpetual state of insurrection against the Filipino government by the inhabitants of the island of Mindanao would grow out of the passage of this bill. He is undoubtedly correct about that.

I have a statement here, which I am going to ask the Secretary to read. It is pretty brief. It was made by a Democratic investigator in the islands. I say Democratic because he is in sympathy with all the Democratic platform pledges in favor of independence for the islands—Mr. James H. Blount. He was an officer in the American Volunteers during the fighting there, and was afterwards for four years a judge in the Philippine Islands, so that he is certainly a disinterested and unprejudiced witness from a Democratic standpoint. He is also a competent one, on account of the length of time he resided in the islands. I have marked on page 224 the passage. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> While the great Mohammedan island of Mindanao, near Borneo, with its 36,000 square miles of area, requires that the Philippine Archipelago be described as stretching over more than 1,000 miles from north to south, still, inasmuch as Mindanao only contains about 500,000 people, all told, half of them semicivilized, the governmental problem it presents has no more to do with the main problem of whether, if ever, we are to grant independence to the 7,000,000 Christians of the other islands, than the questions that have to be passed on by our Commissioner of Indian Affairs has to do with the tariff. Mindanao's 36,000 square miles constitute nearly a third of the total area of the Philippine Archipelago, and more than that fraction of the 97,500 square miles of territory to a consideration of which our attention is reduced by the process of elimination above indicated. Turning over Mindanao to those crudely Mohammedan semicivilized Moros would indeed be "like granting self-government to an Apache reservation under some local chief," as Mr. Roosevelt, in the campaign of 1900, ignorantly declared it would be to grant self-government to Luzon under Aguinaldo. Furthermore, the Moros, so far as they can think, would prefer to owe allegiance to, and be entitled to recognition as subjects of, some great nation. Again, because the Filipinos have no moral right to control the Moros, and could not if they would, the latter being fierce fighters and bitterly opposed to the thought of possible ultimate domination by the Filipinos, the most uncompromising advocate of the consent of the governed principles has not a leg to stand on with regard to Mohammedan Mindanao. Hence, I affirm that, as to it, we have a distinct separate problem, which can not be solved in the lifetime of anybody now living. But it is a problem which need not in the least delay the advent of independence for the other fourteen-fifteenths of the inhabitants of the archipelago—all Christians living on islands north of Mindanao. It is true that there are some Christian Filipinos on Mindanao, but in policing the Moros our Government would, of course, protect them from the Moros. If they did not like our Government, they could move to such parts of the islands as we might permit to be incorporated in an ultimate Philippine republic. Inasmuch as the 300,000 or so Moros of the Mohammedan island of Mindanao and the adjacent islets called Jolo (the "Sulu Archipelago," so called, "reigned over" by the sultan of comic-opera fame) originally presented, as they will always present, a distinct and separate problem, and never did have anything more to do with the Philippine insurrection against us than their cousins and coreligionists over in near-by Borneo, the task which confronted Mr. Root in the fall of 1899, to wit, the suppression of the Philippine insurrection, meant practically the subjugation of one big island, Luzon, containing half the population and one-third of the total area of the archipelago and six neighboring small ones, the Visayan Islands.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment I have offered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the proposed amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposes to his own amendment.

I agree with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that Congress ought to determine the question as to whether we will retain coaling stations and fortresses in the Philippine Islands. That great question ought not to be left to the determination of any one man. We do not, I think, find any good reason for turning an important question of that kind over to the President of the United States. We can not, of course, know who will be President four or six years hence. Why turn over to the President, whoever he may be, however wise he may be, a problem of national and international importance? The question pertains to the defense of our country. It has an intimate relation with our commerce; it affects radically our foreign policy; it is a question that comes plainly within the purview of congressional duties.

We are growing in the habit, whenever a problem becomes difficult of escaping the burden of solution, by referring it to some board or to some officer of the Government, whereas the greater the difficulty the greater is the necessity for that common counsel which can only be obtained in Congress.

We have generally had wise men for Presidents. I make no intimation that they have not always been wise and patriotic; and yet they are not necessarily wiser than Congress or more patriotic than the Members of Congress. Indeed, I can pretty nearly demonstrate that they are not as wise as the collective wisdom of Congress by citing the important circumstance that there are about five or six Members of this body thoroughly convinced of the fact that they are proper stuff for the presidential office. I am inclined to admit that they are much better material than some that has been suggested from the outside.

We ought not to dodge this important question. I appeal to the Senate that it shall exercise its best judgment and that we shall treat this question as of the first magnitude.

I want to make an observation preliminary to what I am about to say. There has been so much said about our country never engaging in anything but a war of defense that some of us at least are taking the view that when we do engage in a war of defense we thereby bar ourselves from making any attack or doing anything except along our own shores or on our own soil. So it is here argued with great solemnity that as we are never to engage in any but a war of defense, there is no necessity for a coaling station or a fortress at any place far removed from our shores.

Senators advancing that argument overlook the fact that a war of defense necessarily implies a war of offense. Once a war is started we can not pick our ground; we can not always select the place where we prefer to fight. When a war is started it is the duty very frequently as a matter of defense to become the attacking party. A nation waging war against us will not only seek to attack our coasts but it will perhaps first of all seek to destroy our war fleet. Surely it will at once try to sweep our commerce from the oceans of the world. Such a result, with its attendant irremediable damage and injury, is certain unless we are able to drive our enemy from the high seas.

It should not be forgotten, once we are at war, the enemy will not always be so accommodating as to make the fight in our waters. It may even be necessary to pursue them or to meet them thousands of miles from our coasts. Inability to do so may place us at a desperate disadvantage. We ought to consider these facts seriously before we abandon the coaling stations in the Philippines which we now control and which we can continue to control.

Let us take a single page from recent history. When we declared war against Spain, in our own defense and in defense of human rights, where was the first effective blow struck? Was it not in the waters of the Philippine Islands? It was necessary to strike there. It was due to the fact that a deadly blow was struck 7,000 miles from our shores that the War with Spain terminated as quickly as it did. It is, therefore, idle to talk about not needing a station in the Philippines because we are hereafter going to wage only defensive wars. It may be both necessary and desirable to fight a defensive war thousands of miles from our coasts. Indeed, I hope the enemy may never get any nearer.

When war is begun, I repeat, it becomes a war general. It must be fought wherever the enemy can be found. To illustrate by a case which I trust never can arise: If we had war with Great Britain to-morrow and wanted simply to defend ourselves, is it not entirely probable that one of our first acts would be to invade Canada, not because we wanted to make an aggressive war, but because an invasion of Canada might be the best way to defend ourselves? I do not want that illustration, Mr. President, to be taken as indicative of a fear that we are likely to have trouble with England. It seems to me, for the reasons stated, that before abandoning our fortresses and coaling stations in the Philippines we must take into account the relations of such advantages to our commerce, as well as their importance in time of war.

It might be, and it certainly has been, the opinion of many military experts that the possession of a coaling station protected by fortresses in the Far East will be of inestimable value to us in some hour of national peril. Let me cite an imaginary case to the Senator from Nebraska, who has so eloquently argued in favor of abandoning these fortresses. Let us suppose that a portion of the American fleet is in Chinese or Japanese waters; that war is suddenly declared; that our enemy has anticipated war, and has thrown a much larger fleet into those waters, so that our vessels can not escape and return to the United States, what a wonderful advantage it might be to us if our ships could run into a harbor under the guns of an American fort, and be preserved to this Nation for future use instead of being sent to the bottom of the ocean!

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to suggest, in the case which he has put, that this foreign fleet which is superior to ours, instead of going after our fleet, would take our naval base and our coaling station, unless we had expended as much money in their fortification as we would expend if we retained the islands themselves?

Mr. REED. Well, that is an assertion by the Senator. I know he makes it in good faith; the Senator always speaks in good faith; and yet I have no hesitation in saying that the Senator probably is very greatly mistaken. The fact is that ships are generally helpless in face of the fire from a first-class fortress.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator explain, if the foreign fleet, as the Senator has put the question, is larger than our fleet, even though he does not admit that that foreign fleet could take the coaling station, why could not the foreign fleet capture our fleet and prevent it from getting into the harbor with safety?

Mr. REED. The Senator is asking a question that answers itself. It is entirely possible that I could not capture the Senator if I started after him now before he got over to his office and locked the door, and yet, if he had no office to retreat to I might capture him in the next block. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Senator will not have to go as far as the office. I agree not to go there.

Mr. REED. The Senator must not take my illustration unpleasantly. He knows I am joking. I know I would not have to go so far as the Senator's seat to find him. He would no doubt meet me more than half way. I never yet saw a real disciple of universal peace who would not himself fight at the drop of a hat; and I know the Senator is in that class. The Senator's retort illustrates the general fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator explain why this foreign fleet would not capture our fleet before it could get into the coaling station or the naval base?

Mr. REED. Well, I thought I had answered that with my illustration, which I hoped was so pertinent as to argue the case. It is easy enough to understand that our fleet might be warned by wireless or otherwise of the approach of a superior enemy fleet in ample time to run under the guns of a near-by fortress when it might be cut off and destroyed if compelled to undertake a voyage of thousands of miles to reach our home ports. Likewise it is easy to understand that we might have a fleet superior to that of the enemy and yet a fleet entirely helpless because it could not receive coal with which to move and fight.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let me ask the Senator this question: If that happened, how could our fleet ever get out to do any service? They would be in there, the other fleet would be outside, and our fleet would have to stay in.

Mr. REED. But can not the Senator see that the enemy fleet would not have to stay outside if our fleet was at the bottom of the ocean? If our fleet, however, was under the guns of a fort and the enemy's fleet had to stay outside and blockade it that much of the enemy's fleet would be useless for business in other territory.

Mr. NORRIS. And so would our fleet.

Mr. REED. Yes; but if our fleet had been sent to the bottom the enemy fleet would be free to go elsewhere. Why, there is no use arguing questions of that kind; they are too plain to require argument. If, for instance, the German fleet, which today lies under the guns of a German fortress, had been compelled to fight upon the high seas and were lying on the ocean's bottom England would be free; she could do as she pleased with her entire Navy instead of being obliged to use a large part of it to keep the German fleet in German ports.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Missouri yield there?

Mr. REED. Yes; although I am taking more time than I expected to do and but for interruptions should have concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's illustration is good, then the place for our fleet, like the place for the German fleet, is in our own ports.

Mr. REED. Oh, pshaw!

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wants to go on a war of conquest, then I concede his argument is good. The German fleet was not over in some coaling station thousands of miles away from its base, but it was in its own waters, and is yet there.

Mr. REED. Well, it was not all in its own waters, for some of its vessels got under German guns——

Mr. NORRIS. There was only one place——

Mr. REED. One moment—and some of them did not, and those that did not went to the bottom of the ocean.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. REED. I will if it serves any purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. The only place in the world where the German Government had a naval station distant from its own ports was over in Asia, and it was completely defeated there, as we would probably be defeated if we had a station 8,000 miles away from our shores.

Mr. REED. Well, yes, the German Government lost its half-completed fortress, but it lost it only because a great military power attacked Germany at a time when Germany was already at grips with three other first-class nations. Under such conditions any Government may lose any fortress. Let it also be noted that it required the fleet and Army of Japan to subdue that single fortress; and if Germany had not had her hands tied very probably the eagle of Germany would still have been defiantly floating above the battlements of her distant fort. I can indefinitely multiply illustrations showing the advantage of a coaling station and a naval base. The imagination of man might almost exhaust itself in bringing forward particular conditions and still half the possible cases not be covered. What I do say is that it is utter foolishness to assume that a war of defense must be waged on our own soil or in our own waters. It frequently happens that the very best defense can be made at a distant point.

I give one illustration that may appeal to some Senators. Assume that we had a war with a naval power; assume that we had a great naval base in the East; and that under the guns of our forts there our vessels would be secure, it is probable that the presence of three or four vessels in eastern waters would enable us to so harass the commerce of an enemy that we would oblige it to use a large part of its fleet for the purpose of keeping penned up even a small unit of our war fleet. Besides, can we not take a lesson from the experience and wisdom of other nations. Let us not forget the fact that Great Britain, France, and Germany all are eagerly embracing every opportunity to establish coaling stations and naval bases in all the seas of the world. Are we so wise we can set up our opinions in opposition to those who make war a science and devote to its problems the best genius of their people. So it seems to me when we consider relinquishing this coaling station and naval base we should proceed with great care.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] gave some figures on the cost of the Philippines. I do not know that I understood him correctly. If I did, then I think he is in error. I sent to the Bureau of Insular Affairs for a statement as to the cost of the Philippines to this Government as nearly as it could be estimated. Here is the information furnished: Under the treaty with Spain we paid $20,000,000; on March 3, 1901, we purchased additional islands for $100,000; we expended for the relief of the inhabitants up to March 3, 1903, $3,000,000; we expended in taking the census in 1903, $351,925.50; the coast and geodetic survey cost $1,947,379.82; and the total cost of the Army from 1903 to 1914, inclusive, was $113,711,371.82, making a grand total from 1903 up to and including the fiscal year of 1914 of $139,110,677.14. If we take the average cost per year and add that for the last year, we have a grand total of $148,586,624.79—almost $150,000,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that that does not include the cost from the beginning of the insurrection, but only includes the cost from 1903 to the present time.

Mr. REED. I was about to make that statement, but that additional cost I have not been able to obtain in a way that is satisfactory to me.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, may I suggest that that does not take into account at all that indefinite sum, difficult to estimate, which it has cost the American people in the maintenance of the Army and Navy due to the fact that we had the Philippine Islands on our hands?

That is an indefinite amount about which we can only speculate, but which must be taken into account in the consideration of this matter.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is correct. If we could get the actual amount in dollars and cents that we have expended because we took possession of the Philippine Islands, it probably would be more than double the figures I have named; but the figures I have given are definite, at least according to the officers of the Insular Bureau.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will state that there was a statement made by the War Department of the cost up to the 1st day of May, 1902; and it was certified that the amount up to that time was $169,853,572, and that did not include any of the incidental expenses which were caused by the increase in the Army or the increase of the Navy, which evidently had to take place in order to effect the conquest of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. REED. Then, according to the Senator's idea and taking that estimate in connection with the figures I have just given, we have expended first and last, in excess of $300,000,000. And even that vast sum does not include the expenses referred to a moment since by Senator CLAPP. Now, Mr. President, the question is this: Having expended over $300,000,000 on account of the Philippine Islands, are we warranted in abandoning the islands, abandoning every fortification we have built, abandoning everything we have done, and retaining nothing whatever for ourselves? I am perfectly willing and ardently desire that this country shall sever its relations with the Philippine Islands at the earliest possible moment, but I am unwilling to surrender the advantage of a naval base and a coaling station in those islands.

It can not be claimed that by retaining them we shall treat the Philippine people unjustly, because the benefits we have conferred a hundred times over exceed the amount we would have had to pay the Philippine people for a coaling station if in 1898 they had possessed a government of their own competent to grant us the right to establish a coaling station. It seems to me, therefore, that we ought to keep a naval base and a coaling station, not only for the reasons I have given but for many others that I do not mention now, because I want to get through with my remarks.

The next question I want to consider for a moment is the claim that we are under some moral obligation to the Philippine people. If by a "moral obligation" it is meant that we are under any duty whatever to continue to occupy the Philippine Islands and expend large sums of money upon them, then I deny such obligation. The briefest kind of historical review demonstrates that fact. The Philippine people as a people never were a nation. They came under the flag of Spain over 300 years ago. They remained a dependency of Spain until we took possession in 1898. During all that period they had not cultivated such a national spirit as to be able to throw off the sovereignty of Spain. Shortly before we took possession they were engaged in a war of rebellion, which did not appear to be progressing very satisfactorily. We then substituted for Spanish rule American rule. That is the change which we effectuated. What man is there in the Senate who will say that by changing Spanish rule for American rule we did not confer a distinct benefit and blessing upon the Philippine people? What man is there here who will say that when the flag of the United States supplemented the banner of Spain the condition of the Philippine people was made worse? If it did not make the condition of the Philippine people worse, if it bettered their condition, then, instead of America owing them an obligation, they owe America a debt of gratitude.

What have we done since that time? We have expended this enormous sum of money; we have introduced improved schools; we have gradually enlarged the privileges of the people; we have done nothing but kindnesses to those people. We have improved their sanitary conditions; we have released them from the thraldom of many of their evil laws; we have built highways, including railroads. In all we have done we have been conferring benefits. Now, if we owe them an obligation it must be on the ridiculous theory that the granting of repeated benefits ripens into a right on the part of the beneficiary, so that he may justly demand as of right that which was originally a gratuity. Therefore I hold that we are under no obligation to the Philippine people to stay there a single day longer than is necessary to permit them to set up a government of their own. Of course, we should not abandon them and leave them without any opportunity to set up such a government.

If we owe the Filipino people nothing except a mere right to set up a government, the question then occurs, What do we owe ourselves? I think we do owe ourselves something. We went into this undertaking to civilize and Christianize and teach and elevate a people. We had no business to undertake it in the first instance. It may be to the credit of the hearts, but it is very little to the credit of the brains of the men who undertook it. Is this Government to assume the task of going into every foreign land and establishing governments and schools for their people? Is it to undertake the business of teaching them civilization and religion and agriculture and science? Is that our business as a Government? If it is, the field is large; the task is eternal; and the raw material illimitable. We would very much better employ the money of our Government among the poor, the lowly, and the unfortunate of our own land. But since we did enter upon this quixotical scheme in the islands, since we have made these enormous expenditures, we owe it to ourselves, as we depart from that country, to take reasonable precautions to guarantee the preservation of such benefits as we have conferred. Therefore I think when we propose to leave at a fixed period we ought to see to it that those liberties we so often boast we have conferred upon ourselves, and which we claim we have in part conferred upon the Philippine people, and that those other blessings which we have sought at this enormous expense to confer upon them, shall be preserved to them so far as is possible.

So I think one of the things that ought to be guaranteed in any bill that we may pass is that the Philippine people shall be given a republican form of government. If you do not guarantee them at the inception a republican form of government, no man here can say that the Philippine people ever will have the opportunity to set up a popular government. If we march away from the islands without having made provision whereby the people of that country shall at least at the first have the opportunity of fairly voting upon the kind of government they desire, if we do not guarantee them that liberty of speech and liberty of debate and liberty of peaceable assemblage which is necessary to the expression of a popular choice, then no man here can say that they ever will have that opportunity unless they gain it at the point of the sword.

How do we know that the Philippine people will be permitted to set up a government that is representative of the Philippine people? How do we know that they ever will have the opportunity to express a choice or an opinion, unless before we go we see to it that they shall at least have one free election, and that they shall set up a government which leaves to the people the right of future choice?

And here I come to a criticism of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I do not know whether it was his purpose to omit any expression on the subject—as to that, he, of course, will speak for himself—but it is not found within his amendment anywhere that the government must be republican in form. A government that is not republican in form is essentially a government of a class or of an individual. If we go away from these islands, if we bind this country now to leave the islands at the end of a given period of time, without specifying that there shall be left there a republican form of government, then a few powerful men may arise, seize the reins of government, set themselves in authority, declare that they constitute the Philippine government, and forever crush and destroy the people of the islands. In such case all that we have taught them of liberty will be a thing that is dead and buried even at the moment we abandon the islands.

I agree that we can not guarantee these people the continuance of a republican form of government. I agree that no man can justly say that if we set up a republican form of government they will forever maintain it. I think there is much in the statement that that form of government which fits the Anglo-Saxon may not fit the brown races. But certainly this is true: Before we leave the Philippine Islands we ought to see to it that every man in the Philippine Islands, however humble, has an opportunity to vote as to the kind of government he wants in the islands. If we do not do that, if we make no provision in regard to that, if we go away from the islands without that, no man can say how soon a few powerful men will plant their feet upon the necks of the great body of the people of the Philippine Islands. Thus the effect of our occupancy may result in imposing upon millions of human beings a government more tyrannical than was that of Spain. So in the end our occupancy of the islands may bring a curse upon them.

Does not this great Nation that stands for liberty, that has expended from three to four hundred million dollars in the acquisition of these islands and in assistance to their inhabitants, owe it to itself that when it goes out it shall leave behind it a free government? That, sir, is not provided for in the Clarke amendment. Under that amendment a small part of the people might set up a government, a few powerful families might set up a government, a military autocrat might arise and, with fire and sword, establish himself, and we would be obliged to yield possession of the islands to such a government.

Is that wise? Should not the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, or any other amendments that may be adopted, contain the language that the government set up shall be republican in form? And should it not contain some guaranty that that government, republican in form, shall have been peacefully established?

It seems to me the question is not open to serious argument, and yet such is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. You find the defect is remedied in every other amendment, I think.

Mr. President, an amendment has been prepared by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] which will be offered, I think—I hope it will be offered—which, in my opinion, contains all there is of good in all of the amendments. It contains what there is of good, I think, in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. It contains, I think, what there is of good in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and also what there was of good in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. It is drawn with some degree of care, and has the safeguards in it which I think ought to be in this bill if we propose to abandon the islands.

Now, I want to offer another observation with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. The matter has already been discussed, and yet so many Senators have been absent that nearly everyone who gets on his feet has a new audience, and so I do not hesitate to refer to it again.

I am unalterably opposed to abandoning the Philippine Islands—withdrawing our governmental power from those islands, sailing away with our troops, abandoning all power to control the governmental policies of the islands, at the same time continuing our responsibility toward the islands; yet that is the proposition of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri pardon a question?

Mr. REED. I will; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand that that is involved in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, except for the limited period of four years. Am I correct about that?

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator think that getting rid of our power and our responsibility after four years is a good deal better than leaving it indefinitely, never to be gotten rid of except by future affirmative action?

Mr. REED. Why, certainly it is better to end a responsibility in four years than it is never to end it; but I am talking about ending the responsibility at the same time our power ends.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that connection, if the Senator will pardon another question, did we end our responsibility in Cuba at the same time that our power ended—except, of course, our physical power with a Navy and an Army which we could order there at any time? Did we reserve any physical power to enforce the Platt amendment, which now controls our relationship with Cuba?

Mr. REED. No; we did not. We withdrew our Army, we withdrew our Navy, and reserved certain rights in our treaties with Cuba; but the question as to Cuba and the question as to the Philippine Islands are just 7,500 miles apart, geographically and every other way. One of them is at our coast, the other is in the distant East. One of them is composed of one class of people, the other is composed of many classes of many peoples. One of them is in close touch with us, the other is distant. One affects our vital interests, the other does not. I think the two cases are in no respect parallel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me a moment further, of course geographically the two cases are in no respect parallel; but the principle of our relationship to the two peoples seems to me to be exactly similar. If it be wrong in the one case to withdraw power and leave a certain degree of responsibility—not a very large degree—and if it be true that we risked that, and that it has succeeded, then I ask the Senator if it does not seem to him that that is a sort of a reason tending to show that we may risk the same experiment once more?

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, we are not making the same experiment. The two cases have so many points of difference that I do not want to spend much time pointing them out. I will mention one or two. Everybody knows that the United States never would tolerate the taking of Cuba by any foreign power. The Monroe doctrine itself would prohibit that. Everybody knows that Cuba lies at the gateway of our southeastern coast. It is, in fact, the military key to the Gulf of Mexico. Everybody knows that we have a direct and intimate and close relationship with that island, and always will have. Besides, the guaranty as far as Cuba was concerned is quite different from that which is proposed with reference to the Philippine Islands.

I want to conclude what I have to say as to my objection to the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas. Here is the language. While it has been read many times, I want to read it into my remarks. After providing that the President shall endeavor to secure the cooperation of other nations in a guaranty of the independence of the Philippine Islands, it proceeds:

> If any of the nations so invited to join the United States in such undertaking shall decline to do so, then the President shall include as parties to such convention or agreement such nations as may be willing to join therein and to assume such obligations; and if none are willing to so unite therein—
> If none are willing—
> then the President is authorized to give such guaranty on behalf of the United States alone for the period of five years from and after the expiration of said period of four years, or any extension thereof, and pending the existence of such separate guaranty by the United States, the United States shall be entitled to retain and exercise such control and supervision in the said Philippines as may be necessary to enforce order therein and to avoid external complications.

Mr. President, either these people are capable of self-government or they are not. We have been in the islands 16 years. At the end of the four-year period, when it is proposed to grant to the Philippines the right to set up a separate government, we will have been there 20 years. If at the end of that time the Philippine people are incapable of maintaining a government of their own, who will say that at the end of a further period of five years they shall be able to maintain a government of their own? And what greater right would there be on our part to abandon them to the tender mercies of all the nations of the world at the end of 25 years than there is at the end of 20 years, counting the time from the date we took possession? Why guarantee them for five years and then quit? If they are capable of self-government and of maintaining a nation, they will be just as capable at the end of the four-year period that we propose to have elapse as they will be at the end of nine years. If they are incapable of self-government now and are to be incapable of self-government at the end of a further four-year period, if they are incapable of maintaining themselves now and will be incapable of maintaining themselves four years hence, then why not nine years hence?

I submit that the right way to deal with the Philippine people is this: First, to get out of the islands honorably, fairly, and justly; second, to retain in the islands a coaling station and a naval base, and by retaining that we do not treat the Philippine people unjustly, for we have paid for it in an expenditure of nearly $400,000,000; but I want to get those privileges by honest and fair agreement with the government that the Philippine people shall select; third, before leaving——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wanted to suggest to the Senator that under the standing order the Senate will adjourn automatically at 5 o'clock, and I should like to inquire whether he would be willing to yield for a motion concerning a recess, and then hold the floor until to-morrow?

Mr. REED. I am going to get through in five minutes.

Third, when we go out of the islands I want to know that the Philippine people have a government that represents the Philippine people, as sound a government as we can help them set up, and I want to know that it is a republican government in form. I am perfectly willing that our Government shall negotiate with other governments to gain for this new nation all international protection possible; but I am unalterably opposed to this Government undertaking to guarantee the independence and integrity of the Philippine people for one hour after we have relinquished our sovereignty over that soil.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask like consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 88), as follows:

> Resolved, That the order fixing the time of the beginning and the adjournment of the daily sessions of the Senate made December 6, 1915, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:
> "The daily sessions of the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall begin at 12 o'clock noon, and adjournment shall be not later than 6 o'clock p. m.: Provided, That at any time after 5 o'clock it shall be in order to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to take a recess, or to extend the session for that day, and any of said motions may be made while a Senator is addressing the Senate without forfeiting any rights of such Senator."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the proviso of the resolution just read certainly conflicts with the rules of this body.

Mr. CHILTON. There is no question about that. It conflicts with Rule VII, and if there is any objection it would have to go.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the first part of the resolution, but I certainly should object to having a part of it conflict with the rules of the Senate, for Senators know that a motion to go into executive session is in order at any time when any question is pending before the body.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I object to that part of the resolution which relates to executive sessions.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Ask for a recess.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, that is all right. I have the floor. I still insist that that language does not prevent any Senator at any other time from moving for an executive session. I ask that the resolution be referred to the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Committee on Rules.

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRACTION CO. (H. DOC. NO. 639).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Capital Traction Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT CO. (H. DOC. NO. 638).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Washington Gas Light Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO. (S. DOC. NO. 272).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO. (S. DOC. NO. 269).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Potomac Electric Power Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO. (S. DOC. NO. 244, PT. 2).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

CITY & SUBURBAN RAILWAY CO. (S. DOC. NO. 273).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the City & Suburban Railway Co. of Washington for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

GEORGETOWN & TENNALLYTOWN RAILWAY CO. (S. DOC. NO. 271).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Georgetown & Tennallytown Railway Co. for the year ended December 31, 1915, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 270).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Chief Clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of Louis H. Andrews, administrator of John Williams, deceased, v. United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8235) to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a resolution adopted at the twenty-fifth annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held at Indianapolis, Ind., urging Congress to designate The Star-Spangled Banner as the national anthem, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for an investigation into the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for appointment of clerks of United States courts by the President, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of the so-called seaman's law, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass the bill now pending before Congress, appropriating the cotton-fund tax, the fund from captured and abandoned and confiscated property from the Southern States, now in the United States Treasury, approximating $100,000,000 to the pensioning of ex-Confederate soldiers, their widows and orphans.

Whereas in the creating of this Republic and the securing to its people their independence the South, in the name of Washington, Jefferson, Adams, and other distinguished patriots gave to this country a service that should be held in grateful remembrance by this Nation; and

Whereas in the Spanish-American War and in the arm of service as shown by our Navy and Army of defense to-day, the South loyally stands as a monument to her fidelity to this country; and

Whereas since the Civil War for 50 years the old Confederate soldiers and the southern people have paid tribute in taxation to aid in the pensioning of the Federal soldiers of the North and the negroes of the South who served in the Federal armies, this proportional taxation of the moneys appropriated by this Government since 1866 for Federal pensions, aggregating the enormous sum of $4,614,000,000 as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and

Whereas as there has remained in the United States Treasury for a number of years the sum approximating $100,000,000 illegally collected from the people of the South; and

Whereas after passage of so many years it becomes impossible to secure the return of this money to the rightful owners; and

Whereas, recognizing it is the wish and desire of the people of the Southern States and their descendants that this fund now held by the United States Treasury be paid out for the pensioning of old ex-Confederate soldiers and their widows and orphans; and

Whereas, as a matter of justice and right, this appeal should not only receive the approval of the Government of the United States but the sympathy and support of every ex-Federal soldier of the North, to whom the ex-Confederate soldier and his descendants of the South for 50 years have given their aid and help to lessen the hardship of their declining years, then let a kindly hand be extended to the remaining old ex-Confederate soldiers of the South, that this fund may give some relief to lighten their burden before taps shall sound over their grave; and

Whereas the bill now before the Congress of the United States by JOHN M. TILLMAN, Member from the third Arkansas district, provides:

"Be it enacted, etc., That upon passage of this act there shall be paid to each soldier who served in the Confederate Army, and to each widow of any Confederate soldier, the sum of $500, and that, in addition to this payment, such soldiers and such widows shall be paid quarterly the sum of $30 per month each during the remainder of their lives.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall be administered by the United States Pension Office.

"SEC. 3. That to carry out this act the sum of $100,000,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated.

"SEC. 4. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage."

Therefore be it now

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That they respectfully invite the support and cooperation of all Southern and of all Northern States in securing the passage of this measure.

I, John Falkner, jr., secretary of the Mississippi Senate, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolution passed by the Mississippi Legislature, 1916 session.

Witness my signature this 26th day of January, 1916.

JOHN FALKNER, Jr.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Forrest County, Miss., remonstrating against the imposition of excessive license fees on retail wagon men who are selling domestic and stock remedies, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Saranac Lake and sundry citizens of Burdett, Clifton Springs, and Albany, all in the State of New York, praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Easley, S. C., remonstrating against an increase in the price of gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4093) to establish a naval academy of the United States on Lake Michigan, at the city of Chicago, State of Illinois; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 4094) to provide for a Government munitions plant and supply depot at or near Pueblo, Colo.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 4095) for the relief of the trustees of the Presbyterian Church at Keyser, W. Va.; and

A bill (S. 4096) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Keyser, formerly New Creek, W. Va.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4097) granting a pension to Margaret Huling; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 4098) granting a pension to John E. Hall (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 4099) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to certain lands of James Payne, his heirs and assigns; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. PENROSE:

(By request.) A bill (S. 4100) to appoint George W. Littlehales a professor in the corps of professors of mathematics in the Navy (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 4101) to correct the military record of Samuel Snyder; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(By request.) A bill (S. 4102) for the relief of Maj. F. C. Boggs; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

A bill (S. 4103) granting a pension to Annie R. North; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. CHILTON. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. Tuesday, February 1, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 2, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art mighty to deliver, strong to uphold and sustain, deliver us, we pray Thee, from evil and sin and make us strong to pursue and do the right, that as instruments in Thy hands we may hasten the coming of Thy kingdom upon the earth in all its fullness and glory. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. KELLEY. To ask unanimous consent for the reading of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is it?

Mr. KELLEY. It is a resolution relating to the ships of the Navy?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is it?

Mr. FOSTER. What kind of a resolution is it?

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will let the Clerk read it, he will understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not have every resolution read here. What is it about?

Mr. KELLEY. The resolution, I will say to the gentleman from New York, recites the ships of the Navy that are now under construction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, what does it propose to do?

Mr. KELLEY. And in view of the speeches made by the President of the United States in the Middle West, it calls upon the Secretary of the Navy to take up the question with contractors and shipyards to determine the earliest date practicable——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let it go in through the basket.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a copy of an interview I gave to newspapers on the question of preparedness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an interview which he gave out himself?

Mr. FOSTER. A newspaper interview?

The SPEAKER. Yes; a newspaper interview on the subject of preparedness.

Mr. FOSTER. How long is it?

Mr. NEELY. How deep is it? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is shorter than if it were delivered.

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing that it should go in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the subject of the ships of the Navy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us do some business first. The gentleman can get five minutes in committee on the bill that is pending.

Mr. KELLEY. It will not take any longer now than then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the subject of the ships of the Navy.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought not to ask that now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 9416), disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the urgent deficiency bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have a few minutes on the proposition, if I may.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. Ten or 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On these amendments?

Mr. MANN. On one of the amendments and incidental matters relative to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference?

Mr. KELLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman from Illinois want to talk about?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About Senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, one of the Senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill is for traveling expenses of the Civil Service Commission, $6,000. I do not know what the merits of the amendment may be, though I have seen their estimates, and it may be entirely proper to allow the amount. I notice that for the present fiscal year—of course it is not affected by this deficiency estimate—one of the civil-service commissioners made a trip to California at an expense of $535.17 for traveling expenses, and then another one of the commissioners made a trip to California at an expense of $503.60. There are but three commissioners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happened to the other one? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I should have supposed that possibly the other one was ill, or he would have visited the exposition out of the funds provided for traveling expenses. It may have been entirely proper that they should make this trip. I do not know. But the traveling expenses of the various officials of the Government in connection with the San Francisco Exposition are almost startling. But they do not stop at expositions, and these traveling expenses are not confined to any administration or to any party.

I think it quite appropriate to call attention to the fact that less than a year ago we made a deficiency appropriation of $2,500,000 in regard to the foot-and-mouth disease, and I am sure it will be interesting to gentlemen, both on the Committee on Appropriations, which made that report, and to gentlemen on the Committee on Agriculture, which carried the annual appropriation in regard to the foot-and-mouth disease, to know how that fund has been expended for traveling expenses.

Here is an item:

Arthur G. Bell, to inspect the colts in the feeding experiments at the bureau experimental farm, $42.45 traveling expenses.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease.

I shall not give very many of the numerous items, although it may seem that I give quite a number. Here is one:

To inspect the cooperative carriage-horse breeding experiment being conducted at Fort Collins, Colo., and arrange the breeding schedule for the spring of 1915, $139.90.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Here is another:

To inspect creameries in connection with the refrigeration, water, and power problems, $174.58.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease. [Laughter.]

Here is another:

To deliver addresses on subjects relating to the dairy industry, and at Pawnee, to ascertain qualifications of an applicant for a position in the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. GARNER. How much?

Mr. MANN. One hundred and forty-four dollars and thirty-eight cents. Here is another one:

To inspect financial records of local offices at New York and Boston.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Here is still another:

To investigate the cost of different operations of city milk plants at Philadelphia and New York.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease. [Laughter.]

And another one:

To inspect a renovated-butter factory at Frederick, Md.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

Also:

To inspect renovated-butter factories and creameries at various places, $478.62.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To confer with parties interested in cow-testing associations, etc.

Charged to the same appropriation.

To attend a meeting of the Southern Wisconsin Dairymen's Association, at Monroe, to deliver an address on the effect of skimmed milk on quality of Swiss cheese.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease. [Laughter.]

To consult with the State department of agriculture in reference to the establishment of cheese factories in the mountain districts of North Carolina.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To investigate the cheese industry in the Western States, and the practicability of establishing cheese factories.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To perform an operation on a Government stallion used in military horse breeding.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease. [Laughter.]

To collect samples of milk for bacteriological analysis.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

And they sent somebody from Washington to Chicago for that purpose, to collect some samples of milk.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. How does the gentleman account for the fact that these vouchers got by the Auditor for the Agricultural Department?

Mr. MANN. I do not account for it.

To attend a meeting of the potato growers of Bangor, Me.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To deliver addresses, and score and analyze the milk entered in competition at various places.

Charged to the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. I can not; I have not the time.

To inspect Karakule sheep.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To organize cow-testing associations—

And so forth.

A large sum, charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To visit colleges regarding work on the cost of milk production.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

I read only a few of these items.

To assist in the cooperative community poultry breeding work being conducted in the vicinity of Winchester, Va., and New York City.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To inspect the cooperative ostrich breeding work being done in Arizona and other points.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To consult breeders concerning the turkey and guinea industries—

And so forth.

Two hundred and seventy-one dollars and eighty-one cents, charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To investigate creamery conditions in the Southern States.

Three hundred and seventy-seven dollars and twelve cents, charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To make a study of the preparation of wools for the market and work in connection with the sheep industry of the West; to study the market classes and grades of wool; to supervise the shearing of Government flocks at Laramie, Wyo.—

And so forth.

Four hundred and seventy-six dollars and thirty cents, charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To attend convention of National Canners' Association in the interest of condensed-milk investigation.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To supervise the erection of the two story and basement brick and concrete building at the United States experimental station.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

I might go on with a number of these.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If I have time, in a moment.

To investigate the horse-breeding work being conducted at the Morgan horse farm.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To supervise the horse and mule investigations being conducted at the United States experimental station.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To give instructions to officials selected to inspect butter for the Navy Department.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

To select and purchase short-horned cows for proposed breeding work that is to be carried on in cooperation with the Kansas Agricultural College.

Charged to the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease.

I do not know who is to blame, or whether anybody is; but it does seem to me that where we are asked to make an emergency appropriation of a large sum of money for one purpose, it is a gross violation of the proprieties, if not of the law, to seize that fund immediately and send men from Washington, traveling all over the United States upon other matters entirely apart from the purpose for which the appropriation is made, and then charge the expense to that appropriation.

Now I yield to my colleague [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. I fully agree with my colleague. I want to ask him, Does he know the total amount that has been expended in these ways which he has enumerated?

Mr. MANN. I do not. There are a great many of these items. This is a report of traveling expenses for the Department of Agriculture for the last fiscal year, which reached us in print yesterday. I was looking up another matter in it and found these items.

Mr. FOSTER. Could the gentleman put in his remarks the total amount that has been charged to this fund for these other purposes?

Mr. MANN. I could, but it is too much trouble; and I am not going to take either the time or the trouble. Any gentleman can get House Document 113 and read the statement of these traveling expenses. I have thought I would address the House some time upon a number of the others, but very likely I shall not get the opportunity.

I think it quite proper to call attention to this in connection with this item where we are asked to make a definite appropriation of $6,000 to take care of our friends in the Civil Service Commission, who have been very free about expending money to take travel trips at the expense of the Government to the San Francisco Exposition. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I will say that the Committee on Appropriations declined to recommend this item in the bill, which appears as a Senate amendment. We have committees on expenditures in the various departments of the Government, whose duty it is to examine and analyze these questions, and if improperly passed upon by the auditor to report whatever remedial legislation is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. EGAN, and Mr. CANNON.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall be forced to object. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the survey, resurvey, classification, and allotment of lands in severalty under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 388), entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," and under any other act or acts providing for the survey or allotment of Indian lands, $100,000, to be repaid proportionally out of any Indian moneys held in trust or otherwise by the United States and available by law for such reimbursable purposes and to remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the survey, resurvey, classification, or allotment of any land in severalty on the public domain to any Indian, whether of the Navajo or other tribes, within the State of New Mexico and the State of Arizona who was not residing upon the public domain prior to June 30, 1914.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I noticed in the last appropriation bill under this paragraph there was unexpended $92,897, and there was expended last year under this paragraph $146,344. May I ask the chairman of the committee this question: Why is it necessary to appropriate this year more than was appropriated and expended last year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will examine the bill, he will see that the appropriation for this year is only $125,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman's bill appropriates this year but $100,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the gentleman understood my question. There was expended last year $146,344, and unexpended $92,897. Now, the committee appropriates in this bill $100,000 and the unexpended balance, which would be about $192,000. Why should you want to appropriate $192,000 this year when you only expended last year $146,000, practically $50,000 more appropriated this year than was expended last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The department recommended $125,000, but the appropriation is cut to $100,000, to be reimbursed out of the funds of the Indians.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that they are appropriating in this item at least $50,000 more than they expended last year. I would like to ask the gentleman if the department thinks that it will need more money this year than last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think it does.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will look at the first page of the report, he will see that the committee has appropriated $817,000 less than the estimate.

Mr. HARRISON. That strikes me as a potent reason why the appropriation should not be as much this year as it was last year. If the appropriations are $850,000 less than the estimates, I think the gentleman's statement reinforces what I said.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the gentleman driving at?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and offer this amendment.

Amend, in line 11, page 2, by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$50,000."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment I want to say that I think the statement of the chairman of the committee is quite enough to sustain the adoption of the amendment. The last appropriation bill carried for this item $125,000. This bill carries $100,000 and the unexpended balance. There was unexpended last year $92,897.18. There was expended last year under this paragraph $146,344.39. In other words, there is to be appropriated under this paragraph $192,897.88, when the department only expended last year, under this paragraph, $146,344.34.

Now, in view of the fact, and in view of the further fact that the chairman of the committee states that the estimates for last year were $856,000 more than they are for this year, and the work of reclassifying and reallotting, and those things that come under the provisions of this paragraph, are constantly decreasing and the work diminishes, it strikes me that $50,000, together with the unexpended balance, is ample enough to appropriate in the bill. Here is an opportunity to save at least $50,000, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee and the hearings. I submit that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, of the expenditures under this item we find that $79,410.26 was made by the General Land Office, which is chargeable to this fund for this reason. The General Land Office, in making surveys on public domains, also surveys Indian reservations, and under agreement between the two different departments, both of which are under Secretary Lane, the expenditures between the two departments are regulated in this way. Therefore we have $79,000 here used by the Land Department and not by the Indian Department. We have cut the appropriation as close as we can by reducing the amount. The gentleman misunderstood my statement. I said that we had reduced the estimate $800,000 for this year—that is, up to June, 1917. We have cut this bill $800,000 below the estimate, and I am sure that the committee gave every item of the bill very close and careful consideration, because there were many new Members on the committee who desired to know all about every possible item.

We had before us, as the hearings will show, the Secretary of the Interior and his assistants and such other persons as he desired to go before us for explanation of these items, and I assured the gentleman that this item especially was given very close consideration. We have cut it as close as we dare do it for the efficiency of the service. Another matter is this: They state that there are many contracts let out at the present time through the department for certain work done that is necessary to allot this land among the Indians, and that these men have contracts with the Government that have to be met between this time and the end of the contract term, and it is necessary to have a small balance for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the gentleman to say that out of this fund $79,000 was spent by the Land Office. Is that true?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. Then there was $79,000 expended out of this fund that should not have been expended out of it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It should have been expended, because of an agreement in the department, as I have already stated, between those two different bureaus under the Secretary of the Interior. The Land Department, having these surveyors in the field, can much better make these surveys for the purpose of allotting these lands to the Indians. Many of these lands have not been surveyed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And let me explain further, for the gentleman seems not to be able to understand. This was set apart on the public domain by Executive order of the President as an Indian reservation, and it became necessary to extend the public-land surveys over these reservations and in doing that the Public Land Department, the Land Commissioner and his department, have extended these surveys. Therefore it should not be charged to their department, but it is charged to the Indian Service in order to have a proper system of keeping the books. I hope the gentleman understands it now.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not exactly understand, because the gentleman has not explained the proposition that I stated, that last year there was $146,000—and I do not think the gentleman is catching what I am asking him now—expended under this item. This year you propose to expend $100,000 and the unexpended balance which was $92,000, which makes $192,000 for this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas may be extended for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I object. I do not want the time, and it is apparent what the gentleman is after.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that these unexpended balances do not represent what the department has actually on hand at this time. These estimates were made prior to the 1st of December, and a great deal of this money which had been contracted for had not been disbursed, and therefore was carried in the balance at that time. A large portion of these amounts has already been contracted for and is perhaps by this time expended. This is a work that really is doing something for the Indians. It is allotting their lands, classifying them, putting the Indian upon reservations, and should, if properly administered, eventually work out the transformation of the Indian to self-sustaining citizenship. It is one item which I think should not be reduced below the amount carried in the bill. We reduce it $125,000 lower than was estimated for.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman speaks of the allotment of Indian lands. What is there in the law in the way of restrictions upon alienation by these allottees?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All of the lands when allotted are restricted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To what extent?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They are restricted from sale. Sales of the lands can not be made unless passed upon by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to answer the question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the Qui-nai-elts Indian Reservation, in southwestern Washington, an enormous reservation, a few allotments have been made, and the result is that these Indians are timber rich and starvation poor. They have their allotment and the timber on it, but they can not sell it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And they can not eat it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And they can not eat it, and are dependent on this Government for little supplies handed out from Government stations. Yet these Indians may be worth, in timber, from $100,000 to $200,000, and this whole fund could be used in attempting to survey that Qui-nai-elts Reservation and not make a dent in it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to believe that the gentleman from Washington is correct. When the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] questioned Mr. Meritt he insisted that this fund ought not to be decreased. I read from the hearing, at page 12:

Mr. NORTON. As a matter of fact, you could get along with $75,000, could you not?

Mr. MERITT. No, sir; because we will need at least $75,000 for survey work, and if we had only an appropriation of that amount we would not have any money for allotment work.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To return to the question I asked a moment ago, has it not been the experience where Indian lands are allotted in severalty and in fee that white men have speedily gotten hold of the land and, in some instances, at ridiculously low prices?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We have had some very notable examples of that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Much of this argument, not all of it, but some of the argument in favor of the allotment of Indian lands for the alleged purpose of having the Indian develop himself and become a business man is primarily for the purpose of enabling the white man to get hold of the Indian's land at a small figure and to work an outrageous fraud.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that all lands of the Indians, when they are allotted, have restrictions placed upon the alienation, and most generally have restrictions placed upon the leasing of the land for agricultural, grazing, and all other purposes. These restrictions now can only be removed by the Secretary of the Interior upon application made by the allottee under the present law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that true in respect to every allottee?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is true with respect to every allottee that is being allotted now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it was not true in the past?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. It has not always been true in the past, and this Congress has often removed restrictions from Indians after their lands had been allotted. Years ago the Government sometimes allotted Indian land without any restrictions at all, but that policy has been abandoned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But those restrictions were removed upon the plea that it was necessary to remove them in order that the Indians might benefit themselves.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the white men took advantage of the situation and got the land.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is correct as to some cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction, repair, and maintenance of ditches, reservoirs, and dams, purchase and use of irrigation tools and appliances, water rights, ditches, lands necessary for canals, pipe lines, and reservoirs for Indian reservations and allotments, and for drainage and protection of irrigable lands from damage by floods, or loss of water rights, including expenses of necessary surveys and investigations to determine the feasibility and estimated cost of new projects and power and reservoir sites on Indian reservations in accordance with the provisions of section 13 of the act of June 25, 1910, $235,000, reimbursable as provided in the act of August 1, 1914, and to remain available until expended: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended on any irrigation system or reclamation project for which specific appropriation is made in this act or for which public funds are or may be available under any other act of Congress; for pay of one chief inspector of irrigation, who shall be a skilled irrigation engineer, $4,000; one assistant inspector of irrigation, who shall be a skilled irrigation engineer, $2,500; for traveling and incidental expenses of two inspectors of irrigation, including sleeping-car fare and a per diem of $3 in lieu of subsistence when actually employed on duty in the field and away from designated headquarters, $3,200; in all, $244,700: Provided also, That not to exceed seven superintendents of irrigation, six of whom shall be skilled irrigation engineers and one competent to pass upon water rights, and one field-cost accountant, may be employed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I notice that it is proposed that this appropriation shall be available until expended. That is not the way we passed it last year in the House. What is the necessity of making this appropriation available until expended in paying for current expenses?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will say this to the gentleman: They are letting contracts for the completion of certain items and there are 80 irrigation items or projects in the United States under this department. It is very often that they have new projects originated, but anything beyond $30,000 must come to Congress for approval before any item can draw money from the Public Treasury. Now, when these items are approved by Congress, then the department lets the contract for the completion of that separate item, but it is necessary that they have some leeway in order to make it reimbursable when they carry out the project.

Mr. MANN. Of course if a contract should be let the current fiscal year under this item the item is available to pay any amount due on the contract for two years after the fiscal year. I do not think that is the purpose of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was the purpose given by the department.

Mr. MANN. Every department likes to pile up appropriations which may remain available until they are expended, and as a rule, no one here knows how much they are. We make these appropriations annually.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman that the department has another reason why this appropriation should remain available until expended. It is urged that there ought to be a considerable balance on hand to take care of emergencies. Very often irrigation projects are injured or destroyed by unexpected floods. For example, a dam may be washed out and it may be necessary to repair it immediately. The gentleman will notice we have made a cut of $100,000 in this amount on account of the large unexpended balance that has accumulated in the past years.

Mr. MANN. I notice that last year the item as it passed the House was $250,000. The item in this bill is $230,000, which is very far from being a cut of $100,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. The amount actually appropriated last year was $345,700.

Mr. MANN. There was no amount appropriated last year at all except by resolution that extended the appropriation of the previous year.

Mr. HAYDEN. The law two years ago carried that amount, then, so that the Indian Bureau has accumulated a considerable unexpended balance. We therefore thought that we were justified in making this cut.

Mr. MANN. That they have accumulated a considerable unexpended balance is the very reason why we ought not to make an expenditure for current expenses available until expended. Annual appropriations ought to be made annual, it seems to me, unless there is some special reason. I understand if they are appropriating for a specific project it may be perfectly proper and quite desirable to make that appropriation available until expended, because that is not an annual item; but the same reasoning that has been given by the gentleman so far would apply to every appropriation which we make in every department of the Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. Well, all departments of the Government are not liable to have the work they are doing destroyed by floods. That is the reason why it is urged that this money should be made available until expended.

Mr. MANN. Every department of the Government that has any public works is liable to have them destroyed by floods, by storms. The Lighthouse Service, the Life-Saving Service, the Forest Service, all of those departments of the Government are quite on all fours in that respect.

Mr. HAYDEN. And many of them have appropriations available until expended.

Mr. MANN. And not one of them has; they have annual appropriations. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the words, page 3, line 8, "and to remain available until expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We concede the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The word "chef" ought to be spelled correctly in line 13, page 3. It should be "chief."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians, $150,000.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, end of line 25, insert "Provided, That no private residence or office within the Indian country outside of Indian reservations, or any baggage or personal effects checked or consigned to any point within the Indian country, outside of Indian reservations, shall be searched by any of the officers for whom appropriation is made in this act, except by authority of a search warrant issued by some competent court or commissioner based on an affidavit that there is probable cause to believe that intoxicating liquors will be there found: Provided further, That when the situation is such that the benefit of such search will be lost unless the same is forthwith made, then in such event, if there be a probable cause to believe that intoxicating liquors are there present, such search may be made without said warrant, based upon such probable cause, but any officer making such search without a warrant as aforesaid, shall be liable to the person aggrieved to respond for damages in an appropriate action, in either State or Federal court, if there be not probable cause for making such search."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that, if the gentleman from Illinois desires to make a statement.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes; I desire to be heard on the amendment, briefly.

Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the gentleman who spoke to the question that I discussed yesterday, it was no part of my purpose or desire in any way to interfere with the proper protection of those who are the wards of the Nation.

Having that object in view I have offered this amendment.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs raises the question of a point of order upon this amendment, and at the conclusion of the remarks which I desire to make I shall in all probability concede the correctness of his position.

It is my desire, if possible, to offer such an amendment to this bill as will to no degree limit or affect the fullest measure of protection that the wards of the Nation should receive, but at the same time I do not want the thin pretext and the thinner guise of protection to the Indian to result in the infliction of a positive wrong upon the inhabitants who reside within this country, who are not of Indan blood and who it was not contemplated should be within the provisions of the treaty.

Here, gentlemen, is the very anomalous situation that arises from the treaty of 1855: Certain territory was ceded to the United States, and by treaty with the Indians it was provided that the laws then existing for the protection of the Indian from the liquor traffic should be extended to this territory.

But at that time the Indians were scattered through the length and breadth of what is practically one-half of the State of Minnesota. Now, they are nearly all withdrawn from that territory.

There are many places where you could travel 50 to 75, or perhaps even 100, miles without encountering a single Indian. These Indian agents, of whom I made complaint here, say, as they travel up and down this country, by reason of the laws of the United States and this treaty, they have the right not only to regulate the morals, manners, and the habits of the white citizens, but also to invade the privacy of homes and personal effects, which is now guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and it is with this last phase only that I am concerned.

I care nothing about the liquor traffic in this section of the country. And I want to say that my entire record as it has been made elsewhere will sustain the statement that I make to you now. There is nothing in my life or nothing in my record, so far as its public aspect is concerned, that would indicate that I am a friend of the traffic in intoxicating liquor.

In the case of Johnson v. Gearlds (234 Ill., p. 422) it was stated that it was true that by terms of the treaty of 1855 this country was protected from intoxicating liquor, but the court also said that it was quite apparent—I do not quote the exact language—that the need for the protection of this treaty had passed and it had become a question upon which Congress should act.

President Taft in his message to Congress, I think the last one, called the attention of Congress to this subject, and he there said that it was now very apparent that the treaty had become obsolete and that the need for it no longer existed. I care nothing whether the need for this treaty exists so far as the sale of intoxicating liquor is concerned, but I do care whether or not the rights of the citizens of the United States are to be invaded by the search which I mentioned yesterday and which I will not here repeat.

Gentlemen of the committee, it is time a halt was put upon invasion of the private rights of the citizen. Even the Post Office Department recognizes the rights of no man to the privacy of the mail, and the question of where the law ceases and strong arm of seizure commences has been questioned during the last two years. I do not charge it as the fault of one administration or another. There is no partisanship in it. But the rights of the individual should be protected under the Constitution of the United States from inflictions of this irritating kind by any administration.

And that is the only reason why I have offered this amendment. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order, in all probability it will be held as good, and it will require me then to introduce an amendment that will go further than I desired to go in the amendment now offered, which I have thought would cover the situation, of which I think I make proper complaint.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question but that this changes existing law and is a limitation on an appropriation bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, at the end of line 25, by inserting the following: "Provided, That no part of the above appropriation shall be used for the purpose of searching any private residence or office outside of an Indian reservation or for searching any baggage or personal effects consigned to any point outside of an Indian reservation."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment also, unless the gentleman desires to speak to it.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I merely wanted to address myself to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] reserve a point of order or make it?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. You can make the point of order if you please.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I make the point of order, then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take any time, because I am frank to say, with my limited experience in this House, that I feel that my views would be of no particular interest and of no great weight to either the Chair or the membership, and for that reason I will refrain from saying more than that this is a limitation upon the appropriation and I think is very clearly within the rules of this House.

From the limited investigation which I have had an opportunity to make, it is amply sustained by a wealth of authority that holds the right does exist to offer an amendment limiting the use of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] make the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is purely a limitation on the appropriation and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I call for a vote, then.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say that this amendment is directed to the accomplishment of one purpose, and that is to provide that no private residence or office and no personal baggage or effects consigned to any point outside of an Indian reservation shall be subject to search.

Now, the law provides stringent penalties for the purpose of protecting the Indian against the sale of intoxicating liquors. If I recall correctly—and I would thank any gentleman to correct me if I do not state it correctly—the law at the present time provides in regard to the sale of liquor to the Indians that the penalty therefor shall not be less than 60 days in jail nor less than a fine of $200. I think the extent of the punishment depends on the state of mind of the judge before whom the case would come.

Mr. Chairman, there should be—and it occurs to me that there could be—no diversty of opinion among the Members of this House; there should be a limitation on the right of the officers for whom this House makes an appropriation to carry on, in a vindictive and most annoying and oftentimes a highly insulting manner, the invasion of the rights of men and women who have occasion to go in and reside within the boundaries of what is called the Indian country.

There is no greater travesty in the use of the English language that the mind can imagine than to say that this great northern part of Minnesota and the other country that has been ceded by the various Indian tribes and now is devoted to the useful pursuit of agriculture and trade and commerce is still "Indian country," and that throughout the legnth and breadth of that country the will of the Indian officer for whom this House makes an appropriation shall be the controlling law.

I protest against it now, as I did yesterday, and say that, in my judgment, it is not within the spirit of our institutions.

I sincerely trust that the House will adopt this amendment, and, while continuing protection to the Indians, they will say that those who are unfortunate enough to be of white blood shall also be protected in the enjoyment of their rights. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because it would seriously interfere with the Indian Department in preserving the Indians from the curse of liquor.

I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] the rest of my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas will be recognized in his own right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of the above appropriation shall be used for the purpose of searching any private residence or office outside of an Indian reservation or for searching any personal effects consigned to any point outside of an Indian reservation.

That would destroy the present law, enacted to protect the Indians from the illegal traffic in intoxicants. If a liquor dealer chooses to set up a saloon or a tiger on the outside of a reservation 10 feet from the border, or if he should set up his tiger a short distance from where there are Indians, the officers of the law would have no right to go into his baggage or his office or his place of business without invoking slow-moving legal machinery, which is often wholly ineffective.

People who do not want to violate the law need have no fear from the appropriation of this money to suppress the traffic or introduction of whisky among Indians. The object of this appropriation is to protect the Indians and not to encourage white men in violating law. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is opposed to the amendment. Its experience teaches it that it is necessary to have this appropriation, and that it is necessary to cover the entire country, and not Indian reservations alone. They are limited in number and extent of territory. If this amendment is adopted, you will have no law worthy the name or sufficiently potent to protect the Indians. The Indian is fond of whisky. He will go wherever he can to get it, and he will leave his reservation to make a purchase of liquor. The favorite method of introducing whisky into Oklahoma Indian reservations and elsewhere is to carry it inside of grips and trunks. They sometimes use coffins in which to convey it to the Indians. Various unique methods are adopted for the purpose.

Now, the outrageous incidents mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois to-day and yesterday are very rare, and aside from that the man invested with the right to make seizures in behalf of the Government is usually an honest man and can be trusted to enforce these protective laws without unnecessary harshness. If this amendment is adopted, it will be done against the advice of the Indian Bureau, which bureau is making an honest effort to enforce the liquor law for the benefit of the Indians.

There was one gentleman only who appeared before the committee favoring the extension of the wet territory in Minnesota. That gentleman represented a brewery, as stated. We have not yet heard from the other side. There ought to be no backward step taken in the business of putting down the traffic that has not only injured the Indian but the white man as well. Liquor never yet made a man better or permanently happier. It has done an infinite amount of harm. I take it for granted that a majority of the Members of this House are opposed to the enlargement of wet territory; in fact, favor a constitutional amendment to prohibit the sale and manufacture of intoxicants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois attempts to amend a section of the Revised Statutes which has been upon the statute books since March 15, 1864. This is the law at present relating to the right of search and seizure:

That if any superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or subagent—

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman kindly give us the number of the section?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is section 2140 of the Revised Statutes:

If any superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or subagent, or commanding officer of a military post, has reason to suspect or is informed that any white person or Indian is about to introduce or has introduced any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country in violation of law, such superintendent, agent, subagent, or commanding officer may cause the boats, stores, packages, wagons, sleds, and places of deposit of such person to be searched; and if any such liquor is found therein, the same, together with the boats, teams, wagons, and sleds used in conveying the same, and also the goods, packages, and peltries of such person, shall be seized and delivered to the proper officer, and shall be proceeded against by libel in the proper court and forfeited, one half to the informer and the other half to the use of the United States; and, if such person be a trader, his license shall be revoked and his bond put in suit. It shall, moreover, be the duty of any person in the service of the United States, or of any Indian, to take and destroy any ardent spirits or wine found in the Indian country, except such as may be introduced therein by the War Department. In all cases arising under this and the preceding section Indians shall be competent witnesses.

That is the law under which we have been operating all these years. It has worked well. It seems to me to-day is not the time in which well-established law should be amended. I agree with the gentleman that it is possible for some officer of the law to act in an arbitrary manner, but that is no reason why the law itself should be repealed, as he seeks to do by his amendment. I am sure this House will not go back on the policy which Congress has pursued all these years in our effort to prevent the Indians of the United States from obtaining liquor, which is the curse of their race.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, it is well that the committee should know the effect of this amendment if it is adopted. The proposed amendment provides that no part of the appropriation shall be used for the purpose of searching any private residence or office outside of an Indian reservation, or for searching any baggage or personal effects consigned to any point outside of an Indian reservation.

Indian country and Indian reservations are two very distinct terms. An Indian reservation has well-defined limits. For illustration, in the northern part of Minnesota most of the region is known as "Indian country." It is recognized in law as "Indian country," but only a small part of it is included in Indian reservations. If this amendment is adopted, this money can be used only for enforcing the law on Indian reservations. Its adoption, as the gentleman from Arizona so clearly stated, will mean, in effect, a repeal of existing law. If this amendment is adopted, it means that an agent of the Indian Bureau may not obtain even a warrant to make search outside of an Indian reservation for evidence of violations of laws against traffic in alcoholic liquors among the Indians, and use any part of this item of appropriation for payment of his salary or expenses in making search under the warrant. Now, it has been left to Congress to repeal, if in its wisdom and judgment it deems such repeal proper, the provisions of the treaty of 1855, providing that no intoxicating liquors shall be sold or brought into the "Indian country" in Minnesota. The repeal of the provision against the sale and use of intoxicating liquors in that section of Minnesota covered by treaties made with the Indians subsequent to 1855 was left to the discretion of the President of the United States. As is well known, a President of the United States has exercised that discretion placed in him, and by Executive order has set aside the provision of the treaty relating to the sale and use of alcoholic liquors. If Congress desires to use the authority vested in it by the treaty of 1855 and repeal these provisions of that treaty, it seems to me it should do that by direct legislation rather than indirectly by an amendment of this character.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I should like to limit the debate. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LENROOT. Five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does any other gentleman desire time?

Mr. EMERSON. I should like five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I may want five minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I should like five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I should like five minutes on the paragraph.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 25 minutes debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto may be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that at the end of 25 minutes debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this proposed amendment, because I have four Indian reservations in my congressional district; and although the condition does not prevail there that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] has detailed with reference to Minnesota, yet the adoption of this amendment would most seriously affect the enforcement of the liquor laws in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. MURRAY. And all the others, would it not?

Mr. LENROOT. And all the others. Now, the effect of the gentleman's amendment will be to largely nullify the laws of the United States with reference to the introduction of liquor, not only into the Indian country but Indian reservations themselves, and the laws with relation to the sale and possession of liquor by Indians, who are wards of the Government. To illustrate, supposing an Indian off the reservation has liquor in his house and is selling it to other Indians. If you adopt this amendment, there is no way of searching that house belonging to an Indian, who is a ward of the Government, for the purpose of getting evidence to enforce the law.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Would not all the penalties against the sale of intoxicating liquors, which are severe, still be applicable and in force?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I want to say that you may write penalties with reference to any subject upon which this Congress may choose to legislate, but if you deprive the officers of the law of the opportunity of getting the evidence upon which to prosecute, your penalties are dead letters, every one of them.

The gentleman realizes that very well. Now, I do not question the specific instances that the gentleman stated yesterday with reference to the abuses which exist, but this is not the way to reach abuses of this kind. It is not proper to reach a few abuses of the law by nullifying the law.

With reference to the general nature of the abuses complained of by the gentleman, I want to say that last summer I was all through this territory which the gentleman speaks of, in every one of the larger towns in that territory, engaged in a lecture tour. I never had my baggage interrupted or examined, never met an Indian officer, and I did not hear during the week or two that I was in the Indian country of a single instance suggested by the gentleman, nor did I hear any complaints on the part of anyone except those who were engaged, or wanted to be engaged, directly in the liquor traffic. I therefore hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to address myself to the subject of the amendment, but I would like to make an inquiry about the appropriation. I do not recall now just when this item was first inserted in the Indian appropriation bill, but a few years ago the appropriation was $50,000. Then we increased it to $75,000, then to $100,000, and the bill of last year carried $125,000, and now this bill carries $150,000. May I inquire of the gentleman what is the reason for this increase; is it because it is so much harder now to prevent liquor being sent into the Indian country than it used to be?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that it is. A great many of the Indian reservations have been opened up in Oklahoma, and in those reservations whites are intermingled. A person who is on Indian land alternates with the whites.

Mr. MANN. There have been no Indian reservations opened up in recent years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is much harder for various reasons to prevent the liquor traffic now than it has been in the past.

Mr. MANN. When you were making appropriations for $50,000 the situation was identical with what it now is, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to state to the gentleman that we examined into this matter very closely. Of course, we can not tell how wisely an appropriation is expended, because we are not on the ground. It does seem to me that we are expending quite a lot of money for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to expend all that is absolutely necessary, but I would like to have an idea whether this is to be increased each year by $50,000, and I would like to know somewhere near when the limit is to be reached, when we are likely to reach the summit of appropriation for this purpose. We would suppose that as the Indian territory was opened up and they were given better rights of citizenship in the State, and the State having become a prohibition State—we would suppose that the cost to the Government of enforcing the law against the introduction of liquor into Indian territory would be less; but, on the contrary, it seems to be steadily and rapidly increasing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that in New York they have recently extended the jurisdiction of the Government over some Indians that we did not have jurisdiction over heretofore, and we have to protect them, and also Indians in Florida and North Carolina.

Mr. MANN. I know that the Indian Office has for years been trying to find some excuse for spending money on the Seminoles, who do not need it. They will be a great deal better off if the Government lets them alone. Are we now engaged in trying to enforce the law as to the Seminole Indians in Florida and the Everglades?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the Government has supervision over them it must try and prevent the introduction of liquor.

Mr. MANN. It seems that the more we civilize the Indians the more it costs to support them; the more we give them land so that they can work, the more money we have to spend to feed them; the more we give them opportunities, the more we have to spend to clothe them; the more opportunity we give them to raise crops and own stock, the more money we have to spend to house them. It is a peculiar situation, to say the least.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the gentleman from Illinois that he should inquire of the gentleman from Texas to defend the increase in this item. Last year in the Indian appropriation bill the item appeared at $75,000. We offered an amendment raising it to $125,000. The gentleman from Texas was defending his bill and argued against the amendment, and in the course of his remarks, when asked why the committee had reduced the appropriation from $200,000 to $150,000, said:

> For the reason that nearly all the Indians, I presume 75 per cent of them, are in States now that have State prohibition, and it is the duty of the State courts and the State sheriffs and the State constables and the entire constabulary force of every State to prevent the sale of these intoxicants; and you will find in every State where these Indians are living that the officers of the county and State are doing their best to protect the Indians from the sale of these intoxicating liquors.
> And not only that, but let me state to the gentleman further that the Federal courts have jurisdiction, and the Federal courts have their marshals and deputy marshals all over the United States, and they are seeking out these bootleggers and they are sending them by swarms to the various United States penitentiaries; and the State officers are doing the very same thing.

He most eloquently argued against that increase, notwithstanding the fact the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had recommended an appropriation of $200,000 for this work. It is gratifying to those of us who last year made a fight to suppress this outrageous traffic in the sale of liquors to the Indians, to see this committee, among whom are the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Oklahoma, who last year so vigorously and persistently and insistently opposed an increase in this item to $125,000 now bringing into this House a provision carrying $150,000 appropriation, increasing it $50,000 over what it was last year and $25,000 over the action of the House last year. We congratulate the gentlemen on their change of front.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to this amendment on general principles. In the first place, I do not believe that all of the officers of the Government are so discourteous as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] would have us believe they are. I am too poor to travel very much, but I have been through Canada some and in my approach to the Canadian line and in my return to the American line I have found the officials not only of this Government but of the Canadian Government very courteous in their treatment of people who were traveling upon the trains, and I do not think he should let any personal inconvenience interfere with the greater authority and power of the Government to enforce such laws as it makes. What would be the use of having law if the Government could not enforce it? When an officer attempts to arrest a man, whether it be for murder or for intoxication, he apparently is transgressing his individual rights, yet it is for the good of the greater number that the rights of the individual are suppressed. That is the difference between law and license. License is where there is no restraint placed upon the individual, and law is where the individual gives up a part of his individual rights for the good of the many. That is civilized government. I say to you now that if you are going to appropriate this money to suppress the liquor traffic among the Indians, there should be no restraint placed upon it in any such form as this amendment proposes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does the gentleman think that the right to search and seize should be exercised at a point 50 miles from any Indian reservation where there is not an Indian residing or coming?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the Indian situation. There are no Indians in my district—that is, red Indians; there are a great many white ones—but I think the Government should not be restrained or restricted in its right to search inside the reservation or outside the reservation for people who may be engaged, as I was led to believe by the statement of the chairman of the committee and other gentlemen, in practices that take place in or about the reservation.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Why should not the same practice prevail in your own State, allowing the cellar of the gentleman's house or his friends to be searched for intoxicating liquors?

Mr. EMERSON. It is.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. On complaint.

Mr. EMERSON. Without complaint or warrant.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Oh, no.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that if an officer suspects a crime is committed in some house—a murder or a theft—that he would not have the right to enter it without getting a warrant? I should say not.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. But the gentleman confuses the heinous crime of murder with that of keeping a pint of beer in one's cellar.

Mr. EMERSON. A crime is a crime, whether stealing a lump of coal or murder. There should be no difference in the enforcement of the law, whether against a poor man or a rich man.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman maintain that it is a crime to keep a quart of beer in one's house?

Mr. EMERSON. Personally I do not drink myself, but if my friend wants to have a quart of beer in his house he may do so.

Mr. MEEKER. It is not a crime per se?

Mr. EMERSON. No; that is true; but that is not the point. If some one would attempt to take it into an Indian reservation in a casket or a coffin or a suit case or a trunk, I think the officers of the Government should have the right of search, and even the right to enter a compartment of some gentleman who is traveling on the train. Personally I have never been able to afford to ride in a compartment, for I have considered myself fortunate to get even an upper berth.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to section 21 of the act of March 30, 1902, and I will state to the House that this was the origin of the protection of the Indians afforded by the General Government from the sale of these intoxicating drinks:

> Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to take such measures from time to time as to him may appear expedient to prevent or restrain the vending or distributing of spirituous liquors among all or any of the said Indian tribes, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

From that time up to the present time this Government has protected its wards, and I hope nothing will occur at this time to interfere with that law.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] for paying me the compliment he did, but really it is not justified, because I feel that a part of this money may not be used as intended. I am somewhat in sympathy with the gentleman from Minnesota respecting conditions in his country. I am as good a prohibitionist as there is on the floor of this House. I have advocated prohibition from one end of Oklahoma to the other and have voted for prohibition both at home and on the floor of this House, but I do not believe money appropriated for suppression of liquor traffic among Indians in an Indian appropriation bill is intended to be used to enforce the liquor law in countries where there are no Indians. The statement was made to the committee that there were no Indians in a part of the country where this money has been used, and that statement was not sufficiently controverted to make me believe otherwise.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to repeat what he said.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The statement was made before the Committee on Indian Affairs that there were no Indians in a certain portion of Minnesota from which whisky was excluded, and my further statement was that that was not sufficiently controverted to convince me to the contrary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that this amendment, if adopted, would affect every Indian reservation?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Most certainly it will, and this amendment should be rejected; but there is no necessity for increasing the amount. In addition to the amount used here supplemental of this $150,000 there are various other funds from which the enforcement of the liquor traffic can be drawn. For instance, the Indian police, $200,000. Any part of that sum can be used, and a great deal of it is used, for the suppression of the liquor traffic. Then we have the Indian inspectors, $30,000. A good deal of that can be used for the suppression of the liquor traffic. More than that, every superintendent, every employee of the Indian Bureau is authorized by the laws to suppress the liquor traffic. The committee felt that an ample amount was allowed by the House last year, but, yielding to the will of the House when this amount was raised to $125,000, and yielding to the sentiment in another body with which we knew we would have to deal, we felt that it would be futile to attempt to curtail expenses and economize upon this proposition, because if we put it at $75,000 or $100,000 the chances were it would be raised to $200,000 or $225,000 before getting into law, so we discussed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the proposition as to whether a raise would be asked for in this amount if we would put it at $150,000, and he said the bureau would not insist upon a raise if the committee would agree to the $150,000.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that only three minutes of time remain.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire more than three minutes of time; was the time fixed by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The time was fixed by unanimous consent. Debate was limited and three minutes still remain.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But, Mr. Chairman, I tried to get recognition several times, but was unable to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the committee were recognized.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this item now before the committee concerns more particularly the northern part of Minnesota perhaps than any other portion of the United States, and inasmuch as I have personal knowledge of conditions existing there, I feel justified in requesting five minutes in which to address the committee.

When I became a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs seven years ago the amount appropriated for this purpose was $40,000. We increased it from year to year until it had reached the sum of $100,000 last year, and now it is proposed by the committee to appropriate $150,000. I have always been among those who were ardently in support of any movement or law or appropriation designed to keep liquor from the Indians. It is our bounden duty to take every precaution and every possible step in that direction. Now, I think this committee ought to be aware of the exact facts when it votes on this proposition. In the northern part of our State is a most peculiar and anomalous situation. A treaty was made with the Indians in 1855, when that territory was a wilderness, which said that liquor should be kept from that territory until Congress ordered otherwise. That treaty was forgotten for half a century. It was resurrected a short time ago. It was resurrected and used for the purpose in some places of keeping liquor from the Indians. So far, well and good. It had my support, and always will have it, in that direction. It has also been used for the purpose of enforcing prohibition in purely white territory. Everybody knows that a big part of the territory covered by the treaty of 1855 is not more Indian than the city of Washington. I see more Indians in the city of Washington each winter than four-fifths of the people residing in that territory ever see in their whole lives. That law still stands until it is changed by Congress.

I believe the amount appropriated, if that law is to be the law of Congress and the Nation, should be ample and sufficient to make prohibition absolute within the entire limits of the area, and I so told the committee when they were considering this bill. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, Mr. Chairman, will never do it. The amount asked by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $200,000, is probably not too great. If it is the opinion of the Congress that we should enforce prohibition in white territory as well as Indian in the northern part of that State, then appropriate every dollar that is needed for that purpose. I do not want to see bootlegging; I do not want to see illicit traffic in liquor; I do not want to see blind pigs and blind stills and other methods, or any means of getting liquor either to the Indians or to the whites. As I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, it is to restrict the expenditure of this fund to those regions where the Indian question is distinctively involved. If it is so restricted the amount appropriated is ample, perhaps excessive. The wisdom of that course you can decide for yourselves. And I want to say to you, gentlemen, and I want to say to you as one who knows the facts, that a good part of the appropriation here contained will be used and must be used in the enforcement of prohibition among the whites. Now, if you want it, vote for it; if you do not, vote the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I think I am within my limits in stating that I have a mutual understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs for the purpose of not offering other amendments which are prepared and in the interest of saving time, and therefore I would like to ask the committee for the privilege of five minutes to speak to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is correct; I think it will save time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman is not going to speak for an increase or a decrease of this amount?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I desire to speak to the pending amendment which I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I will not unduly consume the time of the committee, but ask leave to insert in my remarks as an extension thereof an opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Johnson against Gearlds, Two hundred and thirty-fourth United States Reports, on page 422, and also to include in that extension of my remarks, as throwing light on this question from a historical standpoint, that portion of the message of President Taft which relates to the situation in this so-called "Indian territory."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. That being out of the way, I can make the balance of my remarks extremely brief. The gentleman on the Indian Affairs Committee who spoke in opposition to the amendment, it seems to me, inferentially at least, sounded the keynote of his objection when he asked the Members of this House if they desire to extend the wet territory of the United States. Now, I sympathize with his view upon the liquor question, and I say to you in all sincerity that it is not so very different from my own. Because of the fact that the first amendment which I offered, but which was not so broad as the present amendment, was ruled out of order, it becomes necessary, if I am to present the question to this House, to present an amendment perhaps somewhat broader than was the original scope of the previous amendment, and that is the reason why this amendment was not limited solely to prevent unlawful searches, as the first amendment was limited.

Now, the gentleman has said that we take as illustrations extreme cases, and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] points out very pertinently and very cogently, and, I have an idea, somewhat convincingly, as the basis for his objection to the amendment that while he was traveling in this country during the last summer delivering his very instructive and, I will venture to say, wonderfully entertaining lecture he was not troubled with any search of his baggage.

I congratulate him on his very happy experience and the fact that whatever his baggage contained was undisturbed and reserved for his own use. [Laughter.]

The gentleman points to what he calls an extreme case, and it was also adverted to by the gentlemen upon our own side, who, opposing the amendment, said that I had no right to permit a personal experience to affect an entire situation.

I have had in the complaint which I have made no personal experience that was unpleasant.

But I do resent most bitterly and most deeply the indignities that were offered to a young girl who was a guest in my home, and you all share with me in the same feeling without question. I have no doubt whatever about that.

But advantage is sought to be taken of the fact that one of the cases I mentioned is an extreme case, as the gentleman says; and as the foundation for the argument which he so ably presented he points to the fact that there may be a house within 10 feet of an Indian reservation and that house could not be searched.

Surely, now, the illustration used by him is not an extreme case, is it? It is used for the purpose of making the same kind of argument of which the gentleman complains.

If there is a house within 10 feet of an Indian reservation, it occurs to me that under the Constitution of the United States and its guaranties, which are too often lost sight of in this House, the courts of the United States and the States are open for the process that will give the officers, in the name of the law and using the majesty of the law as the foundation for their action, the right to go into such house and make such search as the law authorizes them to make instead of making them arbitrarily.

I care nothing about the house 10 feet from the reservation, but I do care about the house that is 50 miles from the Indian reservation, where, because of an Indian treaty and under changed conditions which now exist, rights are to be invaded and search and seizure is to be made in defiance of the Constitution of the United States. I am interested not only in protecting the home against liquor but also in protecting it against unlawful invasion and improper violation of its privacy. I want to say—and that there is no subterfuge in what I am saying—and, using the language of the street, if ever a remark was made "on the level" the remark I am about to make is.

I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in the liquor traffic. I have no more tender regard for it than have any of the gentlemen who are opposed to the amendment.

There is no double meaning in my statement, and my course in this House will prove the correctness of what I state to you.

But I am opposed in this day, when the rights of the citizens are being constantly violated, not only by one but all the departments of the Government, to further taking the rights of the citizen away from him.

And whenever occasion offers, no matter what the result will be, no matter whether I am sustained by a single vote in this House or not, I will raise my voice against the further violation of the constitutional right of the citizen. [Applause.]

Opinion of Johnson against Gearlds (234 U. S. Repts., 422):

JOHNSON v. GEARLDS.

APPEAL FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA.

[No. 802. Argued May 1, 1914. Decided June 8, 1914.]

Where complainant's entire case rests on the construction of treaties with Indians in regard to reservations and on the claim that certain of such treaties have been repealed by the subsequent admission of the Territory within which the reservations are situated, this court has jurisdiction of a direct appeal from the district court under section 238, Judicial Code.

The provision in article 7 of the treaty with the Minnesota Chippewa Indians of 1855 that the laws of Congress prohibiting the manufacture and introduction of liquor in Indian country shall be in force within the entire boundaries of the country ceded by that treaty to the United States until otherwise provided by Congress, relates to the outer boundaries and includes all the reservations that lie within.

It is within the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit the manufacture, introduction, or sale of intoxicants upon Indian lands, including not only land reserved for their special occupancy, but also lands outside of the reservations to which they may naturally resort, and this prohibition may extend even with respect to lands lying within the bounds of States.

Article 7 of the Chippewa treaty of 1855 was not repealed directly or by implication by the subsequent act of Congress admitting Minnesota into the Union, nor was that article repealed by the effect of the subsequent treaties with the same bands of Chippewas of 1865 and 1867, but the intent of treaties of 1855, 1865, and 1867, as construed together, was that the acts of Congress relating to the introduction and sale of liquor in Indian country should continue in force within the entire boundaries of the country in question until otherwise provided by Congress.

Article 7 of the Chippewa treaty of 1855 has not been superseded by any of the provisions of the Nelson Act of 1889, or the cessions made by the Indians to the United States pursuant thereto, nor has that article been superseded by reason of any change in the character of the territory affected by the treaty and the status of the Indians therein.

The abrogation of an article in an Indian treaty prohibiting the sale of liquor within territory specified therein until Congress otherwise provides is, in the absence of any considerable number of Indians remaining in that territory, a question primarily for Congress and not for the courts.

The fact that there has been a recent communication and recommendation from the President to Congress on a particular subject and Congress has not acted thereon is evidence that the problem is not so entirely obvious of solution that the courts can declare it to be beyond the range of legislative discretion.

Article 7 of the Chippewa treaty of 1855 having provided for the prohibition against sale of liquor within the entire territory ceded by that treaty until Congress should otherwise provide, held that notwithstanding the subsequent admission of Minnesota to the Union, and the later treaties with the Chippewas of 1865 and 1867 and the changed condition of the country and the status of the Indians, Congress not having otherwise provided, the prohibition is still in force throughout that entire territory, including the city of Bemidji, in which there are but few Indians and in the vicinity of which there is a large area of territory unrestricted by the prohibitions of article 7.

This is a direct appeal from a final decree of the district court, rendered April 20, 1912, granting to appellees (who were complainants below, and will be so designated) a permanent injunction against appellants (defendants below) in accordance with the prayer of the amended bill of complaint. It appears that complainants are severally residents and citizens of the city of Bemidji, Beltrami County, Minn., and at the time of the filing of the bill were, and for a considerable time had been, engaged in business there as saloon keepers, selling at retail spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors at their respective places of business in that city, each of them having paid to the Federal and State governments, respectively, the necessary tax and license fees, and having a receipt from the Federal Government and a liquor license issued under the authority of the State of Minnesota by the municipal council and officials of the city. The bill alleged that each of the complainants had refrained from selling or disposing of any liquor to Indians or individuals of Indian blood and had complied with the Federal and State laws in this and in other respects; that each of them had built up and established a profitable and lucrative trade, and that the jurisdictional amount was involved. It averred that defendants, being citizens of other States, and acting in conjunction as special officers under the Interior Department of the United States Government, were threatening to enforce within the city of Bemidji the provisions of sections 2139 and 2140 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and amendments thereto, and on December 9, 1910, had ordered complainants and other licensed saloon keepers in Bemidji to close their saloons and cease sales of liquor and ship away their stock, threatening that otherwise they would destroy the stocks of liquor in the possession of complainants, on the ground that under article 7 of a treaty made on the 22d day of February, 1855, between the United States and certain bands of Chippewa Indians, certain territory mentioned in the treaty, including what is now the city of Bemidji, was subject to the laws of the United States respecting the sale of liquors in the Indian country.

To the bill as originally filed defendants interposed a demurrer, which was overruled, and a temporary injunction was granted. (183 Fed Rep., 611.) Thereafter the cause was brought to final hearing upon an amended bill and a reamended answer, and the court, adhering to its former conclusion, rendered a final decree, as already mentioned.

The pertinent historical facts, as deduced from the averments of the amended pleadings, are as follows: On and prior to February 22, 1855, certain bands of the Chippewa Tribe of Indians, known as the Mississippi Bands and the Pillager and Lake Winnibigoshish Bands, were in possession of the greater portion of the lands north of parallel 46, within the boundaries of the then Territory of Minnesota. Their country constituted a wilderness, almost wholly uninhabited by civilized people. On the date mentioned, these bands entered into a treaty with the United States, which was approved by the Senate and proclaimed by the President shortly thereafter (10 Stat., 1165). By its first article the Indians ceded and conveyed to the United States "all their right, title, and interest in, and to, the lands now owned and claimed by them, in the Territory of Minnesota, and included within the following boundaries": [Here follows a particular description, by natural boundaries, of a tract of country said to contain about 21,000 square miles.] By the same article the Indians further relinquished and conveyed to the United States any and all right, title, and interest, of whatsoever nature, that they then had in and to any other lands in the Territory of Minnesota or elsewhere. This article mentions no exception or reservation from the lands ceded or granted. By article 2 there was "reserved and set apart, a sufficient quantity of land for the permanent homes of the said Indians; the lands so reserved and set apart to be in separate tracts, as follows." The separate tracts were then briefly described or indicated. For the Mississippi Bands seven reservations were set apart, which came to be known as the Mille Lac, Rabbit Lake, Gull Lake, Pokagomon Lake, Sandy Lake, and Rice Lake Reservations; and besides these, a section of land was reserved for one of the Indian chiefs. For the Pillager and Lake Winnibigoshish Bands, three reservations were set apart, known from their respective locations as the Leech Lake, Lake Winnibigoshish, and Cass Lake Reservations.

The seventh article of the treaty is as follows:

"ARTICLE 7. The laws which have been or may be enacted by Congress, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, to continue and be in force within and upon the several reservations provided for herein; and those portions of said laws which prohibit the introduction, manufacture, use of, and traffic in, ardent spirits, wines, or other liquors, in the Indian country, shall continue and be in force, within the entire boundaries of the country herein ceded to the United States, until otherwise provided by Congress."

By act of February 26, 1857 (11 Stat., 166; ch. 60), the inhabitants of a portion of the Territory, including the lands ceded by the Chippewas as above, were authorized to form a State government and come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The act contained no condition with reference to the treaty of 1855 or the rights of the Indians to any lands within the boundaries of the State. A State constitution was formed, by which Indians were given the right to vote under certain circumstances, and persons residing on Indian lands were declared entitled to enjoy the rights and privileges of citizens as though they lived in any other portion of the State, and to be subject to taxation. This constitution having been ratified and adopted by the people, Congress, by act of May 11, 1858 (11 Stat., 285; ch. 31), admitted the State "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." And by section 3 it was enacted that all the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, should have the same force and effect within that State as in other States of the Union.

Another treaty was made between the Mississippi, Pillager, and Lake Winnibigoshish Bands of Chippewas and the United States under date May 7, 1864, which was ratified and proclaimed in the following year and is known as the treaty of 1865 (13 Stat., 693). It took the place of a treaty of March 11, 1863 (12 Stat., 1249). By its first section the Gull Lake, Mille Lac, Sandy Lake, Rabbit Lake, Pokagomon Lake, and Rice Lake Reservations, as described in the treaty of 1855, were ceded to the United States, with an exception not now pertinent; and in consideration of this cession the United States agreed to set apart for the future home of the Chippewas of the Mississippi a considerable tract of land—part of the great tract ceded in 1855—embraced within designated boundaries, expressly excepting, however, the reservations made in the treaty of 1855 for the Pillager and Lake Winnibigoshish Bands, which were included within the boundaries mentioned. The lands thus set apart for the Chippewas of the Mississippi contained all the territory now within the limits of the city of Bemidji and the lands adjacent to it for a distance of several miles in all directions.

By a treaty made between the United States and the Chippewas of the Mississippi, dated March 19, 1867, ratified and proclaimed in the same year (16 Stat., 719), these bands ceded to the United States the greater portion, estimated at 2,000,000 acres, of the lands secured to them by the treaty of 1865, and in consideration of this cession the United States set apart for the use of the same Indians a tract, to be located in a square form as nearly as possible, with lines corresponding to the Government surveys, the reservation to include White Earth Lake and Rice Lake, and to contain 36 townships. This reservation came to be known as the White Earth Reservation. It lies within the exterior boundaries of the cession of 1855.

The territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of 1867 contains what is now the city of Bemidji and the country about it for miles in every direction.

By an act of January 14, 1889, known as the Nelson Act (25 Stat., 642; ch. 24), the President was authorized to designate commissioners to negotiate with all the different bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota for the complete cession and relinquishment of their title and interest in all their reservations, except the White Earth and Red Lake Reservations, and in so much of these two reservations as in the judgment of the commission was not required to make and fill the allotments required by this and existing acts. The act provided that a census should be taken, and that after the cession and relinquishment had been approved all the Chippewa Indians in the State, except those on the Red Lake Reservation, should be removed to the White Earth Reservation, and lands should then be allotted to the Indians in severalty, in conformity with the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat., 388; ch. 119), and the surplus lands disposed of by sale and the proceeds placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of all the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as a permanent fund, to bear interest, payable annually, for 50 years, and at the end of that period the fund to be divided and paid to all of said Chippewas and their issue then living in cash. By the first section of this act the acceptance and approval of the cession and relinquishment of the lands by the President of the United States was to be deemed full and ample proof of the assent of the Indians, and to operate as a complete extinguishment of the Indian title without further act or ceremony. Commissioners were appointed accordingly, and agreements were entered into between them and the several bands of Chippewas by which the Indians accepted and ratified the provisions of the act and ceded to the United States all their right, title, and interest in their reservations, excepting portions of the White Earth and Red Lake Reservations, and these cessions were approved by the President on the 4th day of March, 1890.

Since the making of the treaty of 1855 the country then ceded to the United States, with the exception of the portions set apart as Indian reservations, has been largely developed, gradually at first, but with great rapidity during recent years, and all the land has become populated by white people and opened up to settlement and organized as political subdivisions of the State, and in the larger portion of the territory industries have been established and commercial interests have grown up, so as to materially change the situation that existed at the time of the making of the treaty. According to the census of 1910, the counties affected by that treaty show a total white population of 382,191. Bemidji is the county seat of Beltrami County and is a municipal corporation, organized under the laws of the State as a city, containing within its corporate limits about 7,000 inhabitants, and, in connection with adjacent municipalities, constituting a population of about 9,000 people. The city is reached by five lines of railroads, three of which have transcontinental connections. The country surrounding it is highly developed, and there are no Indian habitations within 20 miles in any direction from the city.

The original Red Lake Indian Reservation lay immediately north of the great tract covered by the cession of 1855 and was not subject to the treaty of that year. Pursuant to the Nelson Act of January 14, 1889, a considerable portion of this reservation was relinquished to the United States, and has been opened up to settlement, with the result that there is now a strip of territory about 15 miles in width lying a few miles north of Bemidji, which is admittedly exempt from the provisions of any treaty or law relative to the introduction of intoxicating liquors in the Indian country; and in that strip the sale of intoxicating liquors is actually conducted without interference on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Assistant Attorney General Wallace for appellants:

This court has jurisdiction under section 238, Judicial Code, because the construction or validity of article 7 of the treaty of 1855 is drawn in question; the construction or application of the Constitution is involved; the construction of treaties of 1865 and 1867 is drawn in question. (United States v. Wright, 229 U. S., 226.) "Validity" involves existence of treaty. The Minnesota enabling act did not expressly repeal article 7.

The question of implied repeal depends on the relative potency of State police power and the Federal interstate-commerce power.

The court below erred in holding that the State police power was dominant.

Article 7 of the treaty was in force in 1910.

It was not repealed by the Minnesota enabling act.

Webb Case (225 U. S., 663) and Wright Case (229 U. S., 226) control this case.

The Perrin, Dick, and Whisky Cases are like the case at bar, except that Congress acted here before, and there after, statehood.

If Congress still had power after statehood, implied repeal by enabling act is not possible.

A reservation of power in enabling act is not necessary.

Congress could not reserve a power it might not enjoy without reservation.

The State has no police power over Indian commerce.

The McBratney and Draper Cases are distinguished in the Donnelly Case, and Ward v. Race Horse (163 U. S., 504) is distinguished.

The Friedman Case was overruled by the Circuit Court of Appeals (180 Fed. Rep., 1006).

Article 7 was not repealed by treaties of 1865 or 1867, and there has been no express repeal.

It was not necessary to repeat prohibition in 1865 or 1867, because article 7 in the 1855 treaty covered and protected the whole area.

The need for protection of article 7 was as great in 1865 and 1867 as in 1855.

The rule that reconveyance to a grantor cancels existing covenant is not applicable in this case, because there has been no such reconveyance in fact and because that rule does not apply to treaties.

Article 7 had not become a purely arbitrary regulation in 1910.

Three classes of Indians are concerned—full-blood White Earth and all Leech Lake allottees holding prior to act of May 9, 1906. These may be citizens, but can not alienate lands.

All of the above are holding allotments only since the act of 1906. These are not citizens and can not alienate.

Mixed-blood White Earth allottees are citizens of the United States and of the State.

All save class 3 are still in wardship (without regard to other reasons), because the trust period has not expired.

The wardship of mixed-blood White Earth allottees depends on whether they are still regarded as a dependent people by the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

The pleadings do not show that this protection is purely arbitrary as applied to tract A.

The open 15-mile strip never was protected by treaty.

There is present need of 10,000 Indians for this protection, and there is inadequacy of State laws to keep the liquor out.

Mr. Charles P. Spooner, with whom Mr. Marshall A. Spooner, Mr. John C. Spooner, Mr. Fred W. Zollman, and Mr. Joseph P. Cotton, were on the brief for appellees:

This court has not jurisdiction of this appeal under section 238, Judicial Code, because the construction or validity of article 7 of the treaty of 1855 is not drawn in question; the construction or application of the Constitution is not involved; the construction of the treaties of 1865 and 1867 is not drawn in question.

Article 7 of the treaty of 1855 was repealed by the Minnesota enabling act; it was also repealed by the treaties of 1865 and 1867; and it had expired in 1910 because of the act of January 14, 1889, and the change in the character of territory and the status of Indians.

Mr. Justice Pitney, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court.

This direct appeal is taken under section 238, Judicial Code (act of Mar. 3, 1911, c. 231, 36 Stat., 1087, 1157), which allows such an appeal (inter alia) "in any case that involves the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States; in any case in which the constitutionality of any law of the United States, or the validity or construction of any treaty made under its authority is drawn in question." Our jurisdiction is invoked upon three grounds: (a) That the construction or validity of article 7 of the treaty of 1855 is drawn in question; (b) that the construction or application of the Constitution is involved; (c) that the construction of the treaties of 1865 and 1867 is drawn in question. There is a motion to dismiss, based upon the ground that none of these contentions is well founded. We think the motion must be denied. The court below, in overruling the demurrer, based its decision upon the ground that the treaty of 1855 was necessarily repealed by the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States. This decision was based upon the bill as originally framed, but the amendments made no change affecting this ground of decision; and it is evident from the record that in granting the final decree the court adhered to the view expressed in overruling the demurrer. It is insisted by appellants, with some force, that this view was based upon grounds that involved the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States; and that for this reason the direct appeal lies. We find it unnecessary to consider the point, since it seems to us that the entire case for complainants rests at bottom upon grounds that involve the construction of the three treaties referred to, especially that of 1855.

The bill, either in its original or its amended form, did not expressly assert as a ground for relief that the treaty of 1855 had been repealed, in whole or in part, by the admission of the State. On the contrary, relief was prayed upon the ground that the second clause of article 7 (that which related to the liquor traffic and was to remain in force until otherwise provided by Congress) applied only to the ceded territory and not to the reservations set apart within that territory; that by the treaty of 1865 those reservations were ceded to the United States, and ceased to be Indian country in any sense; and that by the subsequent cession in the treaty of 1867 the reservation of 1865 in turn was vested in the United States, and therefore ceased to be Indian country; and, finally, that article 7 of the treaty of 1855 had expired at the time of the acts complained of in the bill (1910) by virtue of the provisions of the act of January 14, 1889, and the cessions made to the United States by the Chippewas of Minnesota pursuant to that act, and because of the changes wrought by time in the character of the territory included in the treaty of 1855 and the status of the Indians therein. These grounds of relief are reiterated in the amended bill, and the averments of the amended answer are calculated to meet them. And the principal force of the arguments on both sides is addressed to the construction of the several treaties referred to. For this reason, if for no other, the direct appeal is well taken.

Upon the merits, we may well begin with the disputed portion of the treaty of 1855:

"ARTICLE 7. The laws which have been or may be enacted by Congress, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, to continue to be in force within and upon the several reservations provided for herein; and those portions of said laws which prohibit the introduction, manufacture, use of, and traffic in, ardent spirits, wines, or other liquors, in the Indian country, shall continue and be in force, within the entire boundaries of the country herein ceded to the United States, until otherwise provided by Congress."

The reference to previous laws clearly points to the act of June 30, 1834, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers" (c. 161, 4 Stat., 729), and kindred acts. The act of 1834 was a revision of previous enactments, and contains many provisions for the regulation of trade and intercourse. Its twentieth and twenty-first sections (4 Stat., 732) prohibit the introduction or manufacture of, or traffic in, spirituous liquor or wine within the Indian country. From them, sections 2139, 2140, and 2141, Revised Statutes, were derived.

By the first section of the act of 1834, the term "Indian country" was defined, for the purposes of that act, as meaning land to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. At the making of the treaty, therefore, the restriction respecting the liquor traffic was in force within the ceded area, because until then the Indian title had not been extinguished. It was the evident purpose of article 7 to continue the restriction in force in the ceded territory, notwithstanding the extinguishment of the Indian title. Such stipulations were not unusual. A contemporaneous treaty with the Winnebagoes contained a similar one (10 Stat., 1172, 1174, article 8). And it has been uniformly recognized that such stipulations amount in effect to an amendment of the statute, so as to make the restriction effective throughout the ceded territory. United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188, 196); Bates v. Clark (95 U. S., 204, 208).

The fundamental contention that underlies the entire argument for complainants is that the first part of article 7 had for its object that the laws of Congress, present and future, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, were to continue and be in force within the reservations created by the treaty; while the latter portion of the article had for its object to keep in force in the ceded country—which, it is said, excludes the reservations—those portions of the laws that prohibited the introduction, manufacture, use of, and traffic in ardent spirits, etc., in the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress; the particular insistence being that the latter clause applies merely to the so-called ceded territory, and not to the lands included within the reservations.

With this construction of the treaty we can not agree. We think it rests upon a misconception of the fair import of the terms employed in article 7, whether considered alone or together with the context, and fails to give due effect to the reason and spirit of the stipulation.

It seems to us that in the qualifying clause—"within the entire boundaries of the country herein ceded to the United States"—the words "entire boundaries" are equivalent to "outer boundaries," and therefore include the reservations that lie within. And this agrees with the context; for, if we turn back to see what is "herein ceded," we find, that by the terms of article 1 the cession is of all the right, title, and interest of the Indians in the lands owned and claimed by them included within designated boundaries—this being the great tract in question—and then, in a separate clause, a relinquishment and conveyance of all right, title, and interest of the Indians in any other lands in the Territory of Minnesota or elsewhere.

There is here no suggestion that the reservations are excepted out of the cession. On the contrary, article 1 in terms vests the Indian title in the United States as to all the described lands, including the reservations mentioned in article 2. The latter article reserves a number of comparatively small and isolated tracts "for the permanent homes of the said Indians." Of these, all are within the outer boundaries of the cession excepting the Mille Lac Reservation, which lies outside. Reading the two articles together, it is evident that the framers of the treaty intended that the reservations themselves should become the property of the United States, subject only to a trust for the occupancy of the Indians. This is placed beyond controversy when we observe that by the latter part of article 2 it was provided that the President of the United States might cause the reservations or portions thereof to be surveyed; assign a reasonable quantity, not exceeding 80 acres in any case, to each head of a family or single person over 21 years of age for his or their separate use; issue patents for the tracts so assigned, which tracts were to be exempt from taxation, levy, sale, or forfeiture, and not to be aliened or leased for a longer period than two years at one time, unless otherwise provided by the legislature of the State with the assent of Congress; not to be sold or aliened in fee for a period of five years after the date of patent, and not then without the assent of the President; and that prior to the issue of the patents the President might make rules and regulations respecting the disposition of the lands in case of the death of the allottee, etc.

The subdivision of the reservations, allotments to individual Indians, and the ultimate alienation of allotments, being thus in view at the making of the treaty, it is unreasonable to give such a construction to the stipulation contained in the second portion of article 7 as would defeat its object, by removing the restriction from scattered parcels of land whenever it should come to pass that the Indian title therein was extinguished. The restriction would be of little force unless it covered the entire ceded area en bloc, so that no change in the situation of the reservations by way of extinguishing the residue of Indian title or otherwise should operate to limit its effect. And so, upon the whole, we deem it manifest that the second clause of article 7 dealt with the entire ceded country, including the reservations, as country proper to be subjected to the laws relating to the introduction, etc., of liquor into the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress. It was evidently contemplated that the bands of Indians, while making their permanent homes within the reservations, would be at liberty to roam and to hunt throughout the entire country as before. The purpose was to guard them from all temptation to use intoxicating liquors.

That it is within the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit the manufacture, introduction, or sale of intoxicants upon Indian lands, including not only lands reserved for their special occupancy, but also lands outside of the reservations to which they may naturally resort; and that this may be done even with respect to lands lying within the bounds of a State, are propositions so thoroughly established and upon grounds so recently discussed that we need merely cite the cases. Perrin v. United States (232 U. S., 478, 483); United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whisky (93 U. S., 188, 195, 197); Dick v. United States (208 U. S., 340).

And we can not agree with the district court that article 7 of the treaty of 1855 was repealed by the Minnesota enabling act or by the admission of that State into the Union upon equal terms with the other States. Neither the enabling act nor the act of admission contains any reference to the treaty, although the latter was so recent that it can hardly have been overlooked. The court seems to have considered that the continued existence of article 7, so far as it prohibited the introduction, manufacture, and sale of liquors within the ceded country outside of the reservations, was inconsistent with the "equal-footing" clause of the enabling and admitting acts. That there is no such inconsistency results very plainly, as we think, from the reasoning and authority of the cases above cited. The court deemed that United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whiskey, supra, and Dick v. United States, supra, were distinguishable upon the ground that in each of those cases the treaty under consideration was made after the State had been admitted into the Union. But if the making of such a treaty after the admission of the State is not inconsistent with the "equal footing" of that State with the others—as, of course, it is not—it seems to us to result that there is nothing in the effect of "equal-footing" clauses to operate as an implied repeal of such a treaty when previously established.

In Ex parte Webb (225 U. S., 663) we had to deal with the effect of the Oklahoma enabling act (June 16, 1906, c. 3335, 34 Stat., 267) upon a previous statute (act of Mar. 1, 1895, c. 145, sec. 8, 28 Stat., 693, 697), which prohibited, inter alia, the "carrying into said [Indian] Territory any of such liquors or drinks," in view of the fact that the enabling act itself required that the constitution of the new State should prohibit the manufacture, sale, or otherwise furnishing of intoxicating liquors within that part of the State formerly known as the Indian Territory; and we held that in view of the existing treaties between the United States and the Five Civilized Tribes and because the enabling act and the constitution established thereunder dealt only with the prohibition of the liquor traffic within the bounds of the new State, the act of 1895 remained in force so far as pertained to the carrying of liquor from without the new State into that part of it which was the Indian Territory.

In United States v. Wright (229 U. S., 226) we held that the prohibition against the introduction of intoxicating liquors into the Indian country found in section 2139, Revised Statutes, as amended by the acts of July 23, 1892 (c. 234, 27 Stat., 260), and January 30, 1897 (c. 109, 29 Stat., 506), was not repealed, with respect to intrastate transactions, by the Oklahoma enabling act, in spite of the provision respecting internal prohibition contained therein as already mentioned.

Upon the whole, we have no difficulty in concluding that article 7 of the treaty of February 22, 1855, was not repealed by the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

We come, therefore, to the principal contention of complainants and appellees, which is that the article was repealed by the effect of the treaties of 1865 and 1867. The argument in support of this contention may be outlined as follows: That by the earliest of the three treaties the several bands of Indians ceded to the United States the great tract of approximately 21,000 square miles, but excepted from that cession the several reservations created for the Mississippi bands and for the Pillager and Lake Winnibigoshish bands; that when the treaty of 1865 was made the Mississippi bands were the owners of their reservations within the exterior limits of the cession of 1855, which reservations were not covered by the second portion of article 7, but were subject to all of the laws of the United States regulating commerce and intercourse with the Indian tribes, simply because of being Indian country in fact; that by the treaty of 1865 the Mississippi bands ceded outright to the United States these reservations, and in return the United States ceded to them the tract of territory already mentioned (including Bemidji and the country surrounding it), excepting those portions included within the reservations of the Pillager and Lake Winnibigoshish bands; and that when, in 1867, in return for the White Earth Reservation, the Mississippi Chippewas re-ceded to the United States the greater portion of the tract set apart for them in 1865, they ceded the same title and the same right and power over the lands that the three original tribes would have had; that is to say, they ceded them free and clear of article 7 of the treaty of 1855.

It will at once be observed that the argument rests at bottom upon the erroneous construction to which we have already called attention, viz, that the second portion of article 7 did not apply to the reservations that were within the exterior limits of the ceded territory. We repeat that, in our opinion, the restriction applied to all the territory that was included within the terms of the cession; as much to those portions set apart for reservations as to the surrounding territory. There was nothing in the treaty of 1865, therefore, to make the receded reservations unrestricted territory, nor was there anything in the treaty of 1867 to remove the restriction from the territory then receded. Reading the series of treaties together, it is plain enough, we think, that the contracting parties in all that was done were resting upon the plain language of the second part of article 7, which declared that the laws relating to the introduction, etc., of liquor in the Indian country should continue in force within the entire boundaries of the country in question until otherwise provided by Congress.

Finally, it is contended that article 7 of the treaty of 1855 had been superseded at the time of the acts complained of in the bill (1910) by virtue of the provisions of the Nelson Act of January 14, 1889 (c. 24, 25 Stat., 642), and the cessions made to the United States by the Indians pursuant to that act, and by reason of the change in the character of the territory included in the treaty of 1855 and the status of the Indians therein.

As already pointed out, this act provided that commissioners to be appointed by the President should negotiate with the different bands of Chippewas in the State of Minnesota for the complete cession and relinquishment of their title and interest in all their reservations in the State, except so much of the White Earth and Red Lake Reservations as was not required for allotments, and that acceptance and approval of such cession and relinquishment by the President should be deemed full and ample proof of the cession and should operate as a complete extinguishment of the Indian title without other or further act or ceremony.

From the averments of the amended bill and answer it is not easy to gather a precise statement of the present situation of the Indian lands and of the Indians themselves, so far as it affects the question before us. Some reference is made to the situation at the Red Lake Reservation, but since it is not clear that the restriction contained in the treaty of 1855 was intended for the protection of the Indians within that reservation we prefer to confine our attention to the situation as it existed in 1910 within the boundaries of the great tract that was the subject of the cession of 1855. Within those bounds there would seem to be remaining only fragments of the White Earth and Leech Lake Reservations; both reservations being in process of allotment under the acts of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat., 388; ch. 119), and of January 14, 1889 (25 Stat., 642; ch. 24), and amendatory acts.

Of the lands that have been allotted a considerable portion are still held in fee by the United States and are nonalienable by the allottees until the expiration of the trust period. Upon the White Earth Reservation, and also at Leech Lake, the Government maintains an Indian agency and superintendent as well as Indian schools. At the White Earth Agency 5,600 Indians are carried upon the annuity rolls; at Leech Lake, 1,750 Indians. The majority of these reside upon lands embraced within the original reservation, and they are the same Indians, or descendants of the same, that were parties to the treaties of 1855, 1865, and 1867. In consequence of their elevation to the plane of citizenship by the operation of the allotment acts, tribal relations have for most purposes ceased to exist, but are recognized for the purpose of the distribution of annuities under the Nelson Act. And it is admitted that for purposes of business, pleasure, hunting, travel, and other diversions these Indians traverse parts of the region comprised in the cession of 1855 outside of the reservations, and thus visit the towns, villages, and cities in the Territory, including Bemidji. On the other hand, it is admitted that their visits to Bemidji are infrequent, and that there are no Indian habitations within a range of 20 miles in any direction from that city. And, as pointed out in the prefatory statement, the diminished Red Lake Reservation is admittedly surrounded by a strip of land, approximately 15 miles in width, which never was subject to the treaty of 1855, and upon which saloons are maintained in close proximity to that reservation. This strip extends along the northerly boundary of the cession of 1855, which is perhaps 10 or 12 miles north of Bemidji.

The argument for treating the restriction of 1855 as no longer in force rests not upon any denial of the fact that there are some thousands of Indians at the White Earth and Leech Lake Agencies who are still more or less under the guardianship of the Government, and for whose protection the liquor restriction ought to be maintained, but rather upon the fact that these Indians are surrounded by territory in which liquor is lawfully obtainable. In support of this it is said that the former Mississippi reservations ceded to the United States in 1865 are unrestricted territory; that so much of the Leech Lake and Lake Winnibigoshish Reservations as were conveyed to the United States in 1890 are such territory; that every allotment from either of these reservations as to which the trust period has expired is such territory; and that lands sold to white men in the reservations is such territory. It will be observed, again, that each of these contentions rests upon the fundamental error that the reservations mentioned in the treaty of 1855 are not within the liquor restriction of article 7.

In view of the interpretation we have placed upon that article, it seems to us that the contention as to changed conditions must be based not upon the supposed fact that the tract covered by the cession of 1855 "is already dotted with wet territory," but rather upon the question whether the restriction—entered into more than half a century ago, when the country was a wilderness—ought to be treated as still in force, in view of the small number of Indians entitled to protection as compared with the large population of whites who now form the great majority of the inhabitants, and in view of the high state of civilization and development of the territory in question.

In Perrin v. United States (232 U. S., 478, 486) we had to deal with a somewhat similar question. That was a review of a conviction for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors upon ceded lands formerly included in the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota. The reservation was created in 1858, and originally embraced 400,000 acres. A considerable part of it was allotted in severalty to members of the tribe under the act of 1887, the allotments being in small tracts scattered through the reservation. By an agreement ratified and confirmed by Congress August 15, 1894 (28 Stat., 286, 314, 318; ch. 290), the tribe ceded and relinquished to the United States all the unallotted lands, and by article 17 of the agreement it was stipulated:

"No intoxicating liquors nor other intoxicants shall ever be sold or given away upon any of the lands by this agreement ceded and sold to the United States, nor upon any other lands within or comprising the reservations of the Yankton Sioux or Dakota Indians as described in the treaty between the said Indians and the United States, dated April 19, 1858, and as afterwards surveyed and set off to the said Indians. The penalty for the violation of this provision shall be such as Congress may prescribe in the act ratifying this agreement." In the ratifying act a penalty was prescribed. The ceded lands were opened to disposition under the homestead and town-site laws and passed largely into private ownership, and the place at which the intoxicating liquors were sold was within the defendant's own premises in a town located upon a part of the ceded lands held in private ownership by the inhabitants, none of whom was an Indian. After overruling the contention that the restriction was invalid because the power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors upon all ceded lands rested exclusively in the State (citing United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whisky, 93 U. S., 188; and Dick v. United States, 208 U. S., 340), the opinion dealt with the further contention that the power of Congress was necessarily limited to what was reasonably essential to the protection of Indians occupying the unceded lands, and that this limitation was transcended by the provision in question because it embraced territory greatly in excess of what the situation required, and because its operation was not confined to a designated period reasonable in duration, but apparently was intended to be perpetual. As to this the court said (p. 486):

"As the power is incident only to the presence of the Indians and their status as wards of the Government, it must be conceded that it does not go beyond what is reasonably essential to their protection, and that, to be effective, its exercise must not be purely arbitrary but founded upon some reasonable basis. Thus a prohibition like that now before us, if covering an entire State when there were only a few Indian wards in a single county, undoubtedly would be condemned as arbitrary. And a prohibition valid in the beginning doubtless would become inoperative when in regular course the Indians affected were completely emancipated from Federal guardianship and control. A different view in either case would involve an unjustifiable encroachment upon a power obviously residing in the State. On the other hand, it must also be conceded that, in determining what is reasonably essential to the protection of the Indians, Congress is invested with a wide discretion, and its action, unless purely arbitrary, must be accepted and given full effect by the courts."

Although the circumstances of the present case are different, and we are here dealing with a question of obsolescence rather than of original invalidity, the language just quoted indicates the point of view from which the question should be approached. But we must not forget that the question is one, primarily, for the consideration of the law-making body; nor are we in danger of doing so, since by the very terms of the stipulation now under consideration the prohibition of the liquor traffic was to continue "until otherwise provided by Congress." We do not mean to say that if it appeared that no considerable number of Indians remained wards of the Government within the territory in question, the courts would not be justified in declaring that since the constitutional warrant for the restriction no longer existed the restriction must expire with it. But where the question confessedly turns not upon a total, nor even upon an approximately complete, emancipation of the Indians from the Federal guardianship, but upon their unimportance as compared with the interests of the population at large, we think the question is legislative rather than judicial.

Indeed, it has only recently been under consideration by Congress. On February 17, 1911 (S. Doc. No. 824, 61st Cong., 3d sess., vol 85), the President, in a special message called attention to the situation in Minnesota resulting from the operation of the old Indian treaties under present conditions; and with respect to the area ceded by the Chippewas in 1855, he stated: "The records of the Indian Bureau show that there are within said area, under the jurisdiction of the superintendents of the White Earth and Leech Lake Reservations, 7,196 Indians, who can be amply protected by limiting the territory as to which said treaty provisions shall remain in force and effect to the area within and contiguous to said reservations, particularly described as follows: * * * I therefore recommend that Congress modify the article of said treaty quoted above so as to exclude from the operations of its provisions all of the territory ceded by said treaty to the United States except that immediately above described."

That Congress has not yet acted upon this recommendation is evidence that the problem is not so entirely obvious of solution that it can be judicially declared to be beyond the range of legislative discretion.

Since it must be admitted that complainants have no ground of relief against defendants if the restriction remains in force at Bemidji, as we hold that it does, it follows that the decree of the district court should be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to dismiss the bill.

Decree reversed.

Mr. Justice McKenna and Mr. Justice Lurton dissent upon grounds expressed in the opinion of the district court, reported in 183 Federal Reporter, 611.

Message of President Taft:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Half a century ago treaties were entered into with Indian tribes occupying a portion of the present State of Minnesota, in all of which were contained provisions prohibiting the introduction, manufacture, use, and traffic in intoxicants in the country which was the subject of the treaties. In the years which have elapsed since making these treaties conditions have largely changed, the Indian population has been reduced, large white settlements have been made, and great cities like St. Paul and Minneapolis have come to occupy a portion of what, at the date of the treaties, was denominated Indian country.

Notwithstanding these facts, this territory still remains subject to the regulations respecting the traffic in liquors originally imposed for the protection of the Indians. Such an anomalous condition of affairs should no longer continue, and the regulation of traffic in liquors in those areas now almost exclusively occupied by white people should be left to them. In those instances where the treaties authorize the President to repeal or modify the provisions, I have exercised that right. Some of the treaties, however, provide that the provisions referred to shall continue and be in force until otherwise provided by Congress.

By the treaty of February 27, 1855 (10 Stat., 1172), with the Winnebago Tribe of Indians that tribe ceded to the United States a tract of land granted to them by the treaty made October 13, 1846, within the Territory—now the State—of Minnesota, lying north of St. Peters River and west of the Mississippi River, estimated to contain about 897,900 acres, and in part consideration of the cession the United States agreed to grant to the said Indians as their permanent home a certain tract to be selected as therein provided. The treaty contained the following provision:

"ART. 8. The laws which have been or may be enacted by Congress regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes shall continue and be in force within the country herein provided to be selected as the future permanent home of the Winnebago Indians; and those portions of said laws which prohibit the introduction, manufacture, use of, and traffic in ardent spirits in the Indian country shall continue and be in force within the country herein ceded to the United States until otherwise provided by Congress."

As there are but few, if any, Indians residing within said area, and the Indian Office reports that there is no occasion for the continuance in force and effect of the treaty provision above referred to, I recommend that legislation be enacted declaring the treaty provision above quoted to be of no further force or effect.

By the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat., 1109), made with the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, ceding to the United States a large area comprising the extreme northeastern portion of the State of Minnesota, it was provided:

"ART. 7. No spirituous liquors shall be made, sold, or used on any of the lands herein set apart for the residence of the Indians, and the sale of the same shall be prohibited in the territory hereby ceded until otherwise ordered by the President."

No legislation has ever been enacted pursuant to this stipulation, and for this reason the same has remained entirely ineffective.

According to the latest Indian census reports, there are within the area ceded by this treaty about 1,253 Indians, most of whom are located within the portion of said territory hereinafter described, whose welfare requires effective laws restricting traffic in liquor in their neighborhood.

I therefore recommend that appropriate legislation be enacted, extending the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country throughout that portion of the territory ceded by said treaty, particularly described as follows:

"Begining at a point where the line between townships 45 and 46 north intersects the line between ranges 15 and 16 west of the fourth principal meridian; thence north along said line to the northeast corner of township 53 north, range 16 west; thence west along the line between townships 53 and 54 north to the point where it intersects the western boundary established by said treaty of September 30, 1854; thence following the said treaty line in a southwesterly direction to the point where it intersects the line between townships 45 and 46 north; thence due east along said line to the point of beginning, and all that portion of the State of Minnesota which lies east of the fourth principal meridian."

By the treaty of February 22, 1855 (18 Stat., 1165), with the Mississippi bands of Chippewa Indians, an area extending almost entirely across the northern part of the State of Minnesota and from its northerly boundary practically to its center was ceded to the United States, the provision thereof concerning intoxicating liquor being as follows:

"ART. 7. The laws which have been or may be enacted by Congress, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, to continue and be in force within and upon the several reservations provided for herein; and those portions of said laws which prohibit the introduction, manufacture, use of, and traffic in ardent spirits, wines, or other liquors in the Indian country shall continue and be in force within the entire boundaries of the country herein ceded to the United States until otherwise provided by Congress."

The records of the Indian Bureau show that there are within said area, under the jurisdiction of the superintendents of the White Earth and Leech Lake Reservations, 7,196 Indians, who can be amply protected by limiting the territory as to which said treaty provisions shall remain in force and effect to the area within and contiguous to said reservations, particularly described as follows:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Wild Rice River; thence in a northeasterly direction along the line established by said treaty of February 22, 1855, to the point where it intersects the line between townships 32 and 33 west of the fifth principal meridian; thence south along said line to the northeast corner of township 146 north, range 33 west of the fifth principal meridian; thence east along said line to the northeast corner of township 146 north, range 25 west of the fifth principal meridian; thence north along the third guide meridian to the northwest corner or fractional township 58 north, range 27 west of the fourth principal meridian; thence east to the northeast corner of said township; thence south along the line between ranges 26 and 27 west of the fourth principal meridian to the southeast corner of township 53 north, range 27 west of the fourth principal meridian; thence west to the southwest corner of said township; thence south along the third guide meridian to the point where it crosses the Mississippi River; thence down the said river to the mouth of Crow Wing River; thence in a westerly direction, following the southern boundary of said treaty to the point where it intersects the line between townships 35 and 36 west of the fifth principal meridian; thence north along said line to the northeast corner of township 136 north, range 36 west; thence west along the line between townships 136 and 137 north to the point where it intersects the boundary line established by said treaty; thence along said boundary to the point of beginning."

I therefore recommend that Congress modify the article of said treaty quoted above so as to exclude from the operations of its provisions all of the territory ceded by said treaty to the United States, except that immediately above described.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 17, 1911.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph. I move to strike out the figures "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 23, strike out the figures "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do this because, as I understand it, that is the estimate submitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire if the debate is not closed on the paragraph?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, there can be no debate. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] may each have five minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And that thereafter the debate be closed on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] each have five minutes on this amendment. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. May we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

Page 3, line 25, strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer this in the utmost hope that it will be adopted by the committee. By a recent vote you have decided that the provision of the law as it stands shall be carried out, and by adopting this amendment you will provide that the provision shall be carried out effectively. I know of my own knowledge that the amount asked for by the commissioner, namely, $200,000, is not too much, and I doubt if it is sufficient to pay the expenses of enforcing what the court has decided is the law in the territory in Minnesota affected. It is an empire in extent. Do not think for a minute that it is with the active cooperation of all the white people in the district. Many of them are assisting, many others of them are opposing, and so when I say it will not be enforced with the cooperation of the whites I mean not with the cooperation of all whites, a part favoring one way and a part favoring the other—the liquor question again. There is only one way to do it effectively, and that is to keep liquor out of the territory. There must be an agent watching every train. There must be agents in practically every community. This means not 10 agents, not 20 agents, but probably 50 or 100 employed in this specific work. Now, give the Indian Office money enough to handle it and handle it effectively, because unless it is effectively handled prohibition will not be enforced throughout the territory and liquor may get to some Indians, there being some Indians in some parts of the territory. If there is looseness in the enforcement of the law, and there will be unless Federal enforcement be complete, as the white communities can not be expected to enforce this or any other liquor law under the circumstances, there will be liquor going in there. It is to be noted that the claim by the Federal authorities that the Federal and not the State laws apply results in there being no enforcement of the State laws controlling the liquor traffic and the burden falls in its entirety upon the Federal authorities. So I say give the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ample funds to protect the Indian where he may be and also ample funds to enforce prohibition among the whites in the purely white territory.

There is one further reason why I ask that the appropriation be increased. There are some places in the State, quite a number of places in the State, not within the territory affected by the treaty of fifty-five, where liquor at this hour is being sold to Indians. I have repeatedly complained to the Indian Office of certain places where a large number of Indians are located and where they are getting liquor every day and night and living in debauchery, and up to the present hour they have been paralytic in the degree of protection they have extended to those Indians.

Now, let us give them some money, so that they can never urge as a reason for their inactivity the fact that they do not have funds sufficient to do the work. There are some places in the State, where Indians are getting liquor, not protected or controlled by the treaty provisions. Give the Indian Office plenty of money to enforce the provision within the treaty territory and outside, too, and let us make it as tight as a drum from one end to the other. As gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Indian Affairs well know, Minnesota is not the only spot on the map. There are some other places in the United States where the Indians need protection, and I think the sum of $200,000 is not too great to cover the items I have mentioned, because you are now to protect the Indians and also to enforce prohibition in a large area purely white, and contrary to the laws the white people themselves have enacted for their government.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to repeat what I said a few moments ago, to the effect that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs thought this amount was ample and sufficient for the protection of the Indians against the liquor traffic, and I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to the fact that not $200,000 but only $150,000 was estimated for, and that only $150,000 was asked for by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit, I may have been misinformed. The gentleman knows.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have the estimate here. The estimate sets out $150,000, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs assured us that would be amply sufficient. With $100,000 last year they had 96 persons engaged in the suppression of the liquor traffic over the different States. As I have already stated, we have $200,000 for Indian police, making $350,000 which is used for the suppression of the liquor traffic, and we have $30,000 for inspectors. In addition, I repeat, as the gentleman from Minnesota well knows, every Indian superintendent and every employee of the bureau is fully authorized to exert himself and to use his services in the suppression of the liquor traffic.

I am in full smypathy with the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians. It has been the Indian's worst enemy. It is the Indian's curse. I suppose they are more addicted to drinking liquor than any other class of people on the face of the earth. When I say that I mean drinking liquor intemperately. They ought to be closely supervised. Their territory should be closely supervised with reference to the sale of liquor among them. But that is no reason why we should undertake, through the Indian bill, to suppress the liquor traffic in a country where there are not Indians.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Assuming that it would require at least $100,000, as I think it will, to protect the territory entirely from liquor—the territory occupied by whites purely and alone in Minnesota—does not the gentleman think that at least $100,000 ought to be appropriated?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Minnesota knows that I do not think that should be done. If there are Indians in Minnesota they should be protected against the liquor traffic, I have no hesitation in my mind at all about that, and if there are Indians in Oklahoma they ought to be protected against the liquor traffic.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. If we have a treaty under which it is the duty of the United States to forbid the introduction of liquor into that territory up there, does not the gentleman think we ought to obey that and forbid the introduction?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If we had a treaty with Indians?

Mr. MANN. We have a treaty, so they say.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think we ought to do it if there are Indians there needing protection.

Mr. MANN. If there is an Indian treaty, does not the gentleman think we are obligated by that treaty—whether there are Indians or not—to enforce it? The treaty is still in force, is it not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The treaty is still in force, but it was made for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians.

Mr. MANN. The treaty is still in force, they say. Congress has the right to repeal it, and will not. Congress is free to repeal it, but refuses to do that. Under those circumstances, does not the gentleman think it is our duty to enforce the provisions of the treaty?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The executive department also has that right. That is not left alone to Congress. The executive department has repealed this same treaty with regard to certain sections of Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. Repealed another treaty; not this same treaty.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Perhaps the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. MANN. This has to be acted upon by Congress, and as we refuse to repeal it and as it is still the law of the land, is it not our duty to enforce it?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, the gentleman asks a hypothetical question I think.

Mr. MANN. No. It is a practical question. It is right here before us.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The treaty is not before us for repeal.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman give the House any idea as to whether the increased appropriation that has been granted has been accompanied by a decrease of drunkenness among the Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; I regret I can not give any information on that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman. Let us see who are in favor of temperance. The Democrats are all opposed to it, as usual.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 29.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MILLER and Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the relief and care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for, and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases, including transportation of patients to and from hospitals and sanatoria, $350,000: Provided, That not to exceed $90,000 of said amount may be expended in the construction and equipment of new hospitals at a unit cost of not exceeding $15,000: Provided further, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians, including the maintenance and operation of general hospitals, where no other funds are applicable or available for that purpose: Provided further, That hereafter physicians regularly employed in the Indian Service may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be allowed in addition to annual leave educational leave not to exceed 15 days per calendar year, such leave to be cumulative for two years, for postgraduate work: And provided further, That out of the appropriation of $350,000 herein authorized, there shall be available for the maintenance of the sanatoria and hospitals hereinafter named, and for incidental and all other expenses for their proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, repairs, equipment, and improvements, not to exceed the following amounts: Blackfeet hospital, Montana, $10,000; Carson hospital, Nevada, $10,000; Cheyenne and Arapaho hospital, Oklahoma, $10,000; Choctaw and Chickasaw hospital, Oklahoma, $20,000; Fort Lapwai sanatorium, Idaho, $40,000; Laguna sanatorium, New Mexico, $17,000; Mescalero hospital, New Mexico, $10,000; Navajo sanatorium, New Mexico, $10,000; Pima hospital, Arizona, $10,000; Phoenix sanatorium, Arizona, $40,000; Spokane hospital, Washington, $10,000; Sac and Fox sanatorium, Iowa, $25,000; Turtle Mountain hospital, North Dakota, $10,000; Winnebago hospital, Nebraska, $15,000; Crow Creek hospital, South Dakota, $8,000; Hoopa Valley hospital, California, $8,000; Jicarilla hospital, New Mexico, $8,000; Truxton Canyon camp hospital, Arizona, $8,000; Indian Oasis hospital, Arizona, $8,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma in charge of the bill first with reference to these new hospitals at a unit cost of $15,000. Here is a provision for $90,000, which may be expended for hospitals at a unit cost not exceeding $15,000. As we have that unit cost in existing law, does the Indian Office, which habitually disregards the act of Congress, pay any attention to this provision of the law?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman doubtless recalls that we had a similar limitation in the last act passed, and several hospitals were erected under its provisions. Perhaps I anticipate other queries of the gentleman when I say that a request was made for an additional allowance of $2,000 each for several of these hospitals already authorized, which request, as the bill disclosed, received adverse action by the committee. It has done that much good anyway, and will certainly do no harm if it remains in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that limitation will do any damage, but will it do any good? Do the Indian Office pay any attention to it? Or is it their habit to go ahead and provide for a hospital which they know will cost more than $15,000, notwithstanding the provision of the law, with the intention of then coming before the House, or, more likely, before the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol, where all things slip through easily, and get an increase in the authorization of cost.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It would not surprise me at all to see another legislative body authorize a deficiency appropriation of $2,000 additional for these hospitals that have already been built; but if this House will stand by the committee, I think we will try to prevent any appropriation exceeding the authorization already made.

Mr. MANN. Of course we all know perfectly well that the conferees of the House will yield and will authorize the additional amount, because the Indian Office, using an expression which I wish I could use in the House but can not, because it would not be parliamentary, will say, "We pay no attention to the law or the House; we are going to build a hospital at such cost as we please, and, having started it and spent $15,000 on it, if it is not finished, you must give us the money to finish it," and you will do it.

Now, I should like to ask about another matter. Why do you put in here a provision that all of these funds may be used for the maintenance and operation of general hospitals where no other funds are applicable or available for that purpose? Does not the committee know, or does not the Indian Office know, whether there are any funds available? Can you not tell at the beginning of the fiscal year whether funds are available for the maintenance of other hospitals, and if so, specify what this money may be appropriated for? That is the loosest language I have seen in an appropriation bill for many years.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In what line is that language found?

Mr. MANN. On page 4, in lines 11 and 12, at the bottom of the second proviso.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That likely comes about on account of a change made in the arrangement of the language of the bill. The original draft of the bill submitted to the committee carried $300,000 for "relief and distress, and so forth," authorizing the expenditure of $90,000 for constructing hospitals. Four other hospitals were provided specifically in other parts of the bill. Our committee thought it would be better to bring all these items, specific and general, together under one head so that we might find the sum total at a glance. In doing this we perhaps neglected to strike out this language "where no other funds are applicable or available."

Mr. MANN. I can give the gentleman the reason why that item was inserted. They go ahead and ask for the maintenance of hospitals at certain places. We give it. That is inserted here. Then they want to have some money that nobody knows anything about to spend for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians, as they call it, to pay somebody some money. They want to hide it. They are afraid to come out in the open and say what they want, and so they sneak in a provision which will probably stay in the bill, giving them authority to use this money, if they do not use it on these specific hospitals. The committee knows nothing about it. Probably nobody in the Indian Office knows about it except the man who prepared it. The head of the Indian Office, I suppose, can not use it to advertise himself, but he will find some way to use it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think that language was left in by mistake of the committee. If the gentleman will indulge me just a moment, I will explain to him again what was done with this item. I do not think he quite caught what I said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. When we came to this one item we found a recommendation of $300,000 for relieving distress, and so forth, including the building of hospitals. Then we found other items, for four different hospitals, aggregating $100,000. The four different hospitals were brought under this paragraph in order that the House might know exactly, as nearly as possible, what is being done.

Mr. MURRAY. The items were scattered through the bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The items were scattered through the bill, and I think this language that the gentleman mentions was left in the bill by an error of the committee. So far as I am individually concerned, I have no objection to the language going out. For the information of the House I will place in the RECORD some data from the Indian Bureau:

HOSPITALS ERECTED OR UNDER CONSTRUCTION DURING FISCAL YEARS 1914 AND 1915.

Leech Lake, Minn., at agency (remodeling), frame; approximate cost, $3,500. Uncompleted. (Open-market construction.)

Pine Ridge, S. Dak., at school, brick, completed; approximate cost, $8,000.

Red Lake, Minn., at agency, frame, completed; approximate cost, $20,105.

Rosebud, S. Dak., one-half mile from agency, brick; approximate cost, $33,200.

Standing Rock, N. Dak., one-half mile from agency boarding school, frame; approximate cost, $26,000. Completed.

HEALTH ITEMS INCLUDED IN INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1917.

"Relieving distress and prevention, etc., of disease among Indians"	$300,000
Support Canton Asylum	45,000
Choctaw and Chickasaw Hospital	20,000
Support of Fort Lapwai	40,000
Support of Sac and Fox	25,000
Support of Winnebago	15,000
	445,000

This does not include support of Red Lake and Fond du Lac hospitals, which, I understand, are to be supported from Chippewa in Minnesota funds; or if not from tribal funds, from "Relieving distress."

Mr. MANN. Then I ask in reference to this further proviso, proposing to give leave to the physicians in addition to their annual leave. How much annual leave do they now get—30 days?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think it is 30 days. The gentleman knows more about that than I do, I think.

Mr. MANN. Government employees here in the District get 30 days' annual leave and then 30 days extra for sick leave, but that does not apply to employees outside. We generally give them 15 or 30 days. What is the specific special reason for giving these physicians extra time at Government expense?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My recollection is that the commissioner explained that that was necessary in order for them to attend medical lectures.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that many of them need to attend medical lectures in order to learn something about the science of medicine. I have not found any lack of facilities for these people to go off at the Government expense. Under this provision one of these physicians in Oklahoma or Arizona will be ordered under his leave to go to New York City, traveling expenses paid by the Government, salary paid by the Government, to learn something which may be very valuable. I fear that this is such a marked departure that it will lead to leave being granted to everyone in the Government service, because there is no place in the Government service where men are so wise that they can not learn something by studying somewhere else.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If I thought that this would lead to the general practice of extending leave in this way, I would oppose it. This was a special case of physicians who wanted to attend postgraduate lectures once per annum, and we thought it might be advantageous so to do. I want to say that if there are any of these physicians in Oklahoma, it is more than I know. I am sure there are none of them with the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not charging the gentleman with any personal interest; I know that he does what he thinks is right. I am satisfied of that. But if you extend the privileges to one class and do not extend them to another class, it is difficult to differentiate. For instance, we wanted to make some recognition of Gen. Goethals and Gen. Gorgas in reference to the Panama Canal. When it was proposed to do that we met with opposition from the War Department unless we included the other officers of the Army and Navy who were appointed in connection with the Panama Canal. That legislation finally went through, embracing a large class of Army and naval officers, and now we are asked, because we tried to give recognition to Gen. Goethals and Gen. Gorgas, and did give them recognition, with all the Army and Navy officers—we are asked to give special recognition to 30,000 civilians connected with the Panama Canal. When we do that we will be asked to extend it to all other civilians in the Government service. Of course we can draw the line, but we seldom do after it is once started. Mr. Chairman, I will make a point of order on that provision.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Perhaps the gentleman has read what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs said about it.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I do not take the commissioner too seriously. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the provision, line 12, page 4, down to the proviso commencing in line 17, page 4.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The point of order will have to be conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order on the provision in the proviso beginning in line 12 and ending in line 17. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the remainder of the paragraph. I see last year there was carried an appropriation of $300,000. There was expended last year $228,706. There was an unexpended balance of $71,233. I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma to say that there was $100,000—new items—transferred from another part of the bill to this paragraph.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; the estimates, to begin with, were $400,000. There was eliminated from it $50,000 and the items which appeared later in the bill brought under this paragraph.

Mr. HARRISON. As a matter of fact, there is an increase of $50,000 over the appropriation of last year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; last year about the same number of hospitals were provided for at about the same price. Year before last there were $50,000 appropriated for one hospital.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that last year there was appropriated $300,000. This year you appropriate $350,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is speaking of a joint resolution passed last year, and not the appropiration bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I mean the appropriation bill two years ago.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Two years ago we had appropriated $150,000 and then $100,000 for a specific hospital, which run the item up to more than it is this year.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the department been permitted heretofore to erect hospitals without being designated in the bill where they were to be located and the amount each would cost?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In some cases yes, in others no.

Mr. HARRISON. At the places named on pages 4 and 5, where hospitals are to be erected——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Those are merely for maintenance.

Mr. HARRISON. The provision that "not exceeding $90,000 of said amount may be expended in the construction and equipment of new hospitals at a unit cost not exceeding $15,000" is the only provision in here that would give them a right to construct new hospitals altogether?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We may have one or two provided for from tribal funds. No; I am just informed that these were stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. The committee appropriates in that item $15,000 to be expended in the erection of five hospitals, and yet at the bottom of the page in some places $40,000 are allowed for maintenance.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is perfectly true, perfectly proper and necessary. Some of these hospitals originally cost more than others and are larger than others, while it might be possible for some to use more for maintenance than construction, and vice versa.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] read this morning to the House respecting the expenditure of money appropriated for the foot-and-mouth disease for so many unauthorized things, may I ask the gentleman how much of this appropriation last year of $300,000 was expended for the relief and care of destitute Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think that is shown in the hearings, though I am not able to turn to it at once.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that it is very important in this connection that we should know how much was expended for the relief and care of destitute Indians, as well as for the suppression and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, and smallpox. When we appropriate $350,000 and give authority to the commissioner to expend it in any way he sees fit, we are liable to have more such cases as that reported by the gentleman from Illinois this morning.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The committee went over the justifications carefully, but it has been some time since then, and, as this committee knows, this bill was reported and taken up by the House before the Committee on Indian Affairs thought it would be brought in. Some of us perhaps have not had time to mark out the provisions about which questions might be asked. I think the gentleman will find that fully set out in the hearings, beginning on page 41.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for three minutes, in order to get this information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I looked through these hearings, and I would say to the gentleman that I found no statement in there from Mr. Meritt or otherwise that showed how much money was expended under these different headings.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman will find it there if he looks carefully. I remember Mr. Meritt did make the statement about it, and I am sure that it was taken down.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Those things run throughout the bill quite a good deal.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I presented a statement for the RECORD yesterday, giving in detail an account of the expenditures of the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915. When that statement is printed in the RECORD, as it will be to-morrow, it will give the gentleman the information that he now asks. The reason the statement and my remarks were not printed in the RECORD to-day is that the Printing Office was unable to have set up last night in time for to-day's RECORD the tables of figures and other data contained in the statement.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the gentleman if the committee, of which he is a very valuable member, had any statement before it as to just how much was expended of this total appropriation of $300,000 last year for the relief and care of destitute Indians, and then how much was expended for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases?

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that the committee had no such statements before it and no such statements were made to the committee by the Indian Bureau.

Mr. HARRISON. How could we get that information, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. NORTON. That information could be obtained, I presume, by application to the Indian Bureau. I judge that it would take some little time for the Indian Bureau to present that to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the statement this morning of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr MANN], that it would be well to have a report from them upon that proposition?

Mr. NORTON. I quite agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, and the RECORD of to-morrow I think will show that somewhat in detail. I believe that from the RECORD to-morrow the gentleman will be able to secure, in part, at least, the information he desires.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question in this connection? I notice there is appropriated $20,000 for a Choctaw and Chickasaw hospital in Oklahoma. May I inquire if this money is to come out of the funds of the tribe or out of the Government of the United States?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is a gratuity.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman think that a tribe as rich as the Choctaw ought to pay for their own hospitals?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not. While they have some money, yet a great many of them are aged, and decrepit, and blind, and not in a condition to yield up funds necessary, and those are the Indians that will have to go to the hospitals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools not otherwise provided for, for other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, and for tuition of Indian children in public schools, $1,550,000: Provided, That not to exceed $40,000 of this amount may be used for the support and education of deaf and dumb and blind Indian children: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation, or any other appropriation provided for herein except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be used to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood whose parents are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they live and where there are adequate free school facilities provided and the facilities of the Indian schools are needed for pupils of more than one-fourth Indian blood: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the support of Indian day and industrial schools where specific appropriation is made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the point of order?

Mr. MANN. The point of order is that it makes an appropriation not authorized by law. I see this paragraph carries an item for tuition of Indian children in public schools, amount not named, included in the item of $1,550,000, which, I believe, is an increase of $110,000 over what the paragraph carried last year. Also, on page 39, there is carried a specific appropriation of $275,000 to aid the common schools in Oklahoma, and on page 41 there is another item carried for aid in the schools. Can the gentleman tell us how much it is expected under this bill, if passed in this shape, there would be expended for the aid of Indians in the common or public schools—not the Indian schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman means in the public schools?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma, who has been very much interested in this subject for years, I should think would be able to know how much he expects to extract from the Treasury at this specific time without much thought.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, last year there was spent from this appropriation $7,526.69.

Mr. MANN. There is no such item as this in last year's bills.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, two years ago.

Mr. MANN. They had no such authority.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Speaking of last year, I mean during the year ended June 30, 1915.

Mr. MANN. Well, there was no such authority then.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Containing this item?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think so. I notice in the justification that the commissioner sets out for such expense, tuition of pupils in public schools, $7,526.69.

Mr. MANN. And you increase the amount of appropriation over the bill of last year $110,000?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MANN. And then propose to provide $275,000 in addition to the common schools, which theoretically may be said to be in part for the payment of——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is provided for, I am just informed, in the old law. This provision under the old law was the same as it is now.

Mr. MANN. Why was it left out of the bill last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, last year we passed a joint resolution continuing the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I am speaking of the bill as it passed the House. We passed the Indian bill last year in the House, and it passed the Senate.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It was stricken out on a point of order, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MANN. This is a very good example. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the language, page 5, lines 16 and 17, "and for tuition of Indian children in public schools."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are a great many school districts, particularly in the Northwest, where the Indians live on untaxed land. Their children go to the public schools. The people who support these public schools have their land taxed and the tax is increased because of the Indian children whose parents pay no tax whatever but who go to these schools. That is particularly true of the Northwest, and I speak of the Northwest because I am familiar with that part of the country. It is thought wise that the education of these Indian children should be paid for, at least in part, by the Government, since the lands upon which their parents live are not taxed, and that demand has been made upon the Indian Department very often. That is the purpose for which the increased appropriation was asked in this bill. It seems only justice that those Indian children who are being sent to white schools and the lands of whose parents are not being taxed, that from the Indian Department, or from some department of the Government, somewhere, should come the money to help support those schools. That is the cause of this appropriation being put in here with the language to which the gentleman objects.

Mr. MANN. There is a good deal in what the gentleman says. Most people who send their children to school do not pay any taxes in the way of a school tax. I pay a large amount of school tax every year and I have no children to send to the schools; I pay it very willingly, but the moment we start in, after giving land to people who go and settle upon it and they get the benefit of that land, to pay tuition for all the Indian children who may go to those schools we have entered upon a large contract. We have already got a considerable contract to feed, clothe, and house the Indians, buy farms for them if they do not happen to have them, as we do in a number of cases. Now, if we start in to say that in addition to maintaining a very large number of very expensive Indian schools we are going, besides that, to maintain the white schools for all the people in those localities, we have got quite a job on our hands.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. It is not my time; my time has not expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been just called to the bill which passed the House last year, and on page 6, beginning line 4 to line 6, this same item is contained, and it is not in italics, so I take it it was carried in the former bill.

Mr. MANN. Page 6? Where in the bill as it passed the House last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Page 6 of the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Oh; I have this item in the bill as it passed the House last year, but it is not in the bill——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This is the bill as it passed the Senate. As the gentleman knows, Senate amendments are always printed in italics.

Mr. MANN. And numbered.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And I find this provision here is not numbered and is not printed in italics.

Mr. MANN. It is not in this item. I do not think that is very important. That was a provision for the appropriation of $50,000; this item carries an appropriation for $1,550,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In the House it carried $1,440,000 with this proviso.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And carried in that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Not more than $50,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted for a moment to speak in regard to what the gentleman from Illinois was saying about supporting the white schools, I would remind the gentleman that the children who are taken care of in these white schools are children who live away from the reservation and who must either be transported several miles in many cases to Indian schools or Indian schools must be built in their own neighborhood. Now, it seems to be wise to send these children to the white schools, and, as their parents live on allotments in a country that has been opened to settlement and whose allotments are not taxed, the community is compelled to bear the burden not only of educating its own children but the children of Indian parents who own land not taxed. The contracts of the Indian Department that have been made in those communities provide for pay at 15 cents per day for these Indian children in white schools, which is far less than the actual expense to the community of those schools. And if this point of order is to be sustained against the bill—that is, the point of order which would make it impossible to pay tuition—then I think an amendment ought to be introduced somewhere to carry out the contracts already made by the Indian Department in paying the bills for the coming year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order against the language.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman, I think, will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is willing, as I understand, to strike this out and insert an amendment which will be a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, by inserting in line 17, after "$1,550,000," the following: "Provided further"——

Mr. MANN. Better insert it after the word "children," in line 20.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. That is better, I think. After the word "children," in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "children," in line 20, the following:
"Provided further, That not not more than $100,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for the tuition of Indian children enrolled in the public schools."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the amount is a little large?

Mr. HARRISON. Very large. There was only $50,000 granted last year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There was $50,000 granted last year, but every year they are trying to get these children as fast as they become capable to go into white schools, as that is the best place to educate them.

Mr. MANN. I agree with that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And as they become more civilized, more come into the white schools, and it takes more money to educate them in the white man's school. How much do you want to make it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will $75,000 be satisfactory?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] suggests he thinks we might compromise on $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] makes the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I reserve the point of order.

I want to say in this connection that in the hearings before the committee Mr. Meritt stated he hoped there would not be a limitation placed upon this expenditure. He said:

Yes, sir; and under the appropriation of $1,550,000 we can care for the education of those Indians in public schools, and we would suggest that there be no limitation on the amount to be used, because we are gradually working the children into the public schools, and it is possible we may need more than $20,000; and we will also take care of the education of the Papago Indians out of this appropriation.

So it was suggested by some of the committee that $20,000 would probably be enough, and objection was raised to that amount. Now, in the appropriation bill carried last year the limitation was $50,000. It strikes me that $75,000 is too much.

Mr. MANN. I do not think a great abuse could come up from an appropriation of $75,000. The danger has been, and always is, that in these things where you give the whole sum of money which may be utilized for a certain purpose no one knows what one of the bureaus of the Government will undertake to do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman let me suggest that the Papago Indians have not been supplied with schools before. Those Indians are nomadic. They travel over the country, and it is hard to get them confined to a settlement and get them to go to school. The department has tried in every way they can to get them to do so.

Mr. Meritt says:

We would suggest that there be no limitation on the amount to be used, because we are gradually working the children into the public schools, and it is possible that we may need more than $20,000; and we will also take care of the education of the Papago Indians out of this appropriation.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I am certain that there is a continued increase in the demand for money for the purpose of paying tuition of Indian children in the public schools, and I believe that $75,000 is the proper amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] make the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be amended to read "seventy-five thousand" instead of "one hundred thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that his amendment may be modified by changing it from "one hundred thousand" to "seventy-five thousand." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 33, page 5, by striking out "one-quarter" and inserting "one-half."
Also, in line 2, page 6, by striking out "one-quarter" and inserting "one-half."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, up to a few years ago evidently there was a great abuse of the privileges of this paragraph. In other words, children with one-eighth Indian blood or less would go to these schools and would be educated by the Federal Government under the provisions of this paragraph, and in the wisdom of the Congress a limitation was put upon this expenditure. That limitation reads as follows:

That no part of this appropriation, or any other appropriation provided for herein, except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be used to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood, whose parents are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they live.

When Mr. Meritt was before the committee he was asked about this proposition, and he stated:

You recall, Mr. Chairman, that you incorporated that legislation in the Indian bill two or three years ago, and it has been very helpful in getting out of these nonreservation schools children of less than one-fourth blood who ought to be educated in the schools in the immediate vicinity where they live, and it has been also helpful in enabling us to provide education for the more worthy Indians and children who are Indians in fact.

Now, it strikes me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that if it was helpful in putting a limitation of one-fourth Indian blood upon the children going to these schools, we ought to go further and limit it to one-half, because white children ought not to be permitted to go to those nonreservation schools. If this provision is in the interest of the Indian children, to educate them, and so on, then we ought to make it more so. I submit that my amendment would do that; and if that is the purpose of the committee, it ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction, lease, purchase, repair, and improvement of school and agency buildings, including the purchase of necessary lands, and the installation, repair, and improvement of heating, lighting, power, and water systems in connection therewith, $400,000: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allow employees in the Indian Service, who are furnished quarters, necessary heat and light for such quarters without charge, such heat and light to be paid for out of the fund chargeable with the cost of heating and lighting other buildings at the same place: Provided further, That the amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees prescribed by section 1, act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the objection?

Mr. MANN. Every portion of the paragraph is subject to a point of order. I would like to get a little information. What is the necessity of including in this $400,000 item the right to use any portion of it or all of it for the purchase of lands?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is this way: Some nonreservation schools have changed from the ordinary educational schools for Indians to educational schools by farming and stock raising, and so forth, and it is necessary to have more land than the original school was located upon, probably 5 or 10 acres. If it becomes necessary to change it to an industrial school, it is necessary to have something to farm upon. That is the reason given by the department.

Mr. MANN. They are able to furnish that information to the committee, are they not; where they need land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have done so in many instances. The gentleman will find it in the report.

Mr. MANN. Where they need it, it is perfectly proper to have an item for the purchase of land, as was done in some other items in this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think they ought to be educated more along industrial lines than on educational lines.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with the making of the appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has something to do with the purchase of land.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it is all right to purchase land where needed, without giving them blanket authority to go out and purchase land. There is not a single place in the Government where that blanket authority is given. It ought not to be given here. The Indian Office is quite capable of informing the committee and the Congress, both in its estimates and its testimony, as to whether and where they need to purchase land. They can ask for an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that this question was asked and the answer was given:

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a fact that you did not have the right before to include the purchase of necessary lands? What do you mean by that?

Mr. MERITT. The law read "sites," but we wanted to make it perfectly plain that we had authority to purchase lands for school purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The word "sites" was not strong enough to include the purchase of necessary lands?

Mr. MERITT. It might not include enough land for a garden or for a little farm in connection with maintaining the day schools.

Mr. MANN. It says "a little farm." It may be a thousand acres or a little farm. They may want to go and buy homesteads and anything they please under the authority granted. They have no right to such an authority.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This says "necessary lands" for necessary school purposes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know; but they are the judges of that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If we permitted them to buy land at all, what amendment would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I suggest that they inform Congress and the committee where they want to buy land and ask for an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman will see from the reading here that this applies to the reservation schools and the setting apart of land for that purpose, and not for schools other than those on the reservation.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. They do not need to buy land on the reservations. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They will need to buy land in many instances. Where the land is allotted to the Indians, the Indians will not give up their allotment for the purpose of putting a school upon it, and no one else will. Many of these lands have been allotted to the Indians.

Mr. MANN. They can furnish the information to Congress.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, in this paragraph it is proposed to make a permanent law of the provision that we have carried sometimes, giving to the employees of the Indian Service light and heat, in addition to quarters furnished them, free of charge. It may be a proper thing to give them that. I suppose next they will want gasoline and wood and coal, like the Army and Navy officers in Washington do, frequently at less than the ordinary cost. It seems to me it is sufficient to carry that annually, so that there may be some control over the abuse of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am willing for the word "hereafter" to be stricken out, if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language in lines 7 and 8, page 6, "including the purchase of necessary lands," and also against the word "hereafter," in line 10.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I admit that the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I merely do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Texas a question. This provision, beginning on line 16 and concluding on line 20, says:

The amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees prescribed by section 1, act of August 24, 1912.

What is meant by that, I will ask the gentleman? I was just wondering what is meant by the wording of the paragraph in lines 16 to 20, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On what page?

Mr. HARRISON. On page 6.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I read:

That the amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees prescribed by section 1—

And so forth. You will find that on page 49.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will find that means that they can not include in the maximum compensation the cost of light, heat, and quarters that are furnished.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it proper for it to be in this particular place?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think so. This is exactly the language of the department.

Mr. HARRISON. That would not make it so, would it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is a matter of regulation. That was the way that they desired it.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert at the end of line 20, on page 6, the following:

"Provided, That of this amount there may be expended for construction of a sewer system and purchase of necessary easements therefor for the Pala Indian Reservation, Cal., $4,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I reserve a point of order for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from California to explain his amendment, if he desires to do so.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, I had this proposition up with the Indian Office, and, after considering the same, I received the following letter from Assistant Commissioner Meritt:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 24, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KETTNER: Referring further to the matter of a sewer system in the Pala Indian Reservation, Cal., I am informed that 75 per cent of the proposed sewer line would be on allotted Indian lands and the remainder of the system would be across Government lands. Under the circumstances and because a legal question might arise as to the applicability of the general appropriation, "Indian school and agency buildings, 1917," for an improvement of this character, I would suggest that the safe course would be to have the Indian appropriation bill contain a specific item authorizing the use of funds for this definite purpose.

Very truly, yours,

E. B. MERITT,
Assistant Commissioner.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I understand it, then, three-fourths of this sewer line would be on Indian land?

Mr. KETTNER. Three-fourths of the line, according to Assistant Commissioner Meritt's letter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And one-fourth on the public domain?

Mr. KETTNER. And one-fourth on the public domain.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the object of this is to get authority to build it through the public domain?

Mr. KETTNER. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian and public schools, and for placing school pupils, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of white families qualified to give them moral, industrial, and educational training, $72,000: Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this sum may be used for obtaining remunerative employment for Indian youths and, when necessary, for payment of transportation and other expenses to their places of employment. The provisions of this section shall also apply to native Indian pupils of school age under 21 years of age brought from Alaska.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I can see the purpose of the committee and the department in reference to the education of children from Alaska, but as a matter of interest I would like to inquire whether the Eskimo children are Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not. That has been quite a mooted question for many years, but I am of the opinion that the Aleuts would come under the provision. They are the only Indians that I know of in Alaska who receive education by the United States. It is doubtful whether the Eskimos have any standing that would admit them to the schools of the United States, but I think the Aleuts would come under this classification.

Mr. MANN. It is not intended by inserting the word "Indians" to call the Eskimos Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the gentleman from Illinois I will say that in a law prohibiting the sale of liquor to Indians in Alaska, passed some years ago, it was provided:

That the term "Indians" in this act shall be construed as including the aboriginal races inhabiting Alaska when annexed to the United States, and their descendants of whole or half blood.

So that the word "Indian" in Alaska includes anyone who is a descendant of the aboriginal races inhabiting Alaska.

Mr. MANN. That was a definition for the purposes of that act.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. For the purposes of that act.

Mr. MANN. They might have said that for the purposes of that act it should include natives of Asia or Europe.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is the only definition of an Indian in Alaska that is found in the statutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But I understand from the department that they have let in the Aleuts only, under any definition we have had of the word "Indian."

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the gentleman in connection with this item—

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian and public schools—

How much money is expended in collecting them and transporting them to and from these schools?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For the transportation of Indians the amount requested was $75,000, and the analysis of expenditures found on page 53 shows, traveling expenses, $67,205.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not that include the traveling expenses of the employees of the department also?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I suppose it does. I think always, when they send Indian pupils to and from nonreservation schools, some one attends them.

Mr. HARRISON. Suppose they should send one pupil from a reservation in California to the Carlisle School?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They very often do that.

Mr. HARRISON. In that event, sending one pupil, would they send some employee of the department all the way with that pupil?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not. I think pupils are gathered together from a group of States, and then they cross the continent together.

Mr. HARRISON. They do not always supply some employee to attend them, then?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is a matter of regulation that the department must control—the department controlling the education of the children.

Mr. HARRISON. How many Indians are there who are furnished transportation to Carlisle or to the Sherman School?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think in the Carlisle School they have something like a thousand pupils, and I think seven or eight hundred in the Sherman School; but the Sherman School is much nearer the Indians than the Carlisle School.

Mr. HARRISON. Then they supply transportation for a thousand pupils to the Carlisle School and 700 to the Sherman School?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the gentleman to say that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are that many in the school. I do not know how many are supplied with transportation.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked the gentleman if he knew how much was expended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The amount for traveling expenses is stated at $67,205.11. They do not state how many pupils or their names.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be very easy for them to state that. In view of the use of money for traveling expenses by the Department of Agriculture called to our attention this morning, it is well for us to know how this money is being expended and whether it is doing any good; and if it is not doing any good, we ought to stop making the appropriation. I think, really, that is very valuable information, but I understand the gentleman to say that he has not it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; I have not.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

All moneys appropriated herein for school purposes among the Indians may be expended, without restriction as to per capita expenditure, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that that it is a change of existing law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct; I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purposes of preserving living and growing timber on Indian reservations and allotments, and to educate Indians in the proper care of forests; for the employment of suitable persons as matrons to teach Indian women and girls housekeeping and other household duties, for necessary traveling expenses of such matrons, and for furnishing necessary equipments and supplies and renting quarters for them where necessary; for the conducting of experiments on Indian school or agency farms designed to test the possibilities of soil and climate in the cultivation of trees, grains, vegetables, cotton, and fruits, and for the employment of practical farmers and stockmen, in addition to the agency and school farmers now employed; for necessary traveling expenses of such farmers and stockmen and for furnishing necessary equipment and supplies for them; and for superintending and directing farming and stock raising among Indians, $425,000: Provided, That the foregoing shall not, as to timber, apply to the Menominee Indian Reservation in Wisconsin: Provided further, That not to exceed $25,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be used to conduct experiments on Indian school or agency farms to test the possibilities of soil and climate in the cultivation of trees, cotton, grains, vegetables, and fruits: Provided, also, That the amounts paid to matrons, foresters, farmers, and stockmen herein provided for shall not be included within the limitation on salaries and compensation of employees contained in the act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. May I ask the gentleman from Texas how much is paid to these matrons, and how many are there?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is given in the hearings. There are 60 in number.

For the employment of suitable persons as matrons to teach Indian women and girls housekeeping and other household duties, and for furnishing necessary equipment and supplies, and renting quarters for them where necessary.

All field matrons (60 in number) receiving $600 and over per annum devote their entire time to the work. Fifteen matrons, paid $300 each per annum, are employed for half their time. However, this practice does not obtain the best results, and it is now the policy to reduce the number of half-time matrons as rapidly as practicable. The number now in the service on this basis (15) represents a reduction of 4 from the preceding year.

Mr. HARRISON. Do you propose by this bill to increase the pay of the matrons?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. HARRISON. What is this last proviso for?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Some of the matrons work half time and get $300 now, and the department is to change so that they will work full time and get $600.

Mr. HARRISON. If the law is changed, it will pay them more money than they are now receiving.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what is stated in the hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. If the last proviso should be adopted, there would then be no limitation as to the salary placed upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That would be a matter for the construction of the department.

Mr. HARRISON. How many farmers are employed under this paragraph?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two hundred and ten, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. How much is their salary?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The statement of the department is that there are 210 farmers. It further says:

The number of farmers now employed is entirely too small to adequately cover the territory involved in the 643,843 acres of cultivated land (averaging 2,420 acres to each Government farmer) or to give each Indian farming that close personal attention so necessary to successful results. In addition, there are 11,962 able-bodied male adult Indians not now engaged in farming, with 6,948,768 acres of uncultivated agricultural land on the different reservations. Many of these Indians are, of course, engaged in other industrial activities, but by far the greater number of them should be farming, and it is the task of the Indian Service farmers to increase the number of Indians farming and the total cultivated acreage to the greatest possible extent, as well as to see that proper and remunerative methods are used. In view of these facts, it is felt that the additional amount asked for is absolutely essential to the effective prosecution of the important work assigned to this particular branch of the service.

Mr. HARRISON. Are they under the civil service?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And are the matrons under civil service, too?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. How many stockmen are employed under the provisions of this paragraph?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman will find that in the hearings, on page 64.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. How much do these farmers get?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. All the way from $300 to $1,200. Some are on larger reservations than others. They do not all get the same salary, of course.

Mr. HARRISON. How much was appropriated last year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is stated on page 65 of the hearings that the total amount of salaries paid the farmers was $47,840.

Mr. MANN. This item is the same as in the bill of last year. I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that this last proviso is essential to the paragraph. The paragraph is good for nothing without it.

Mr. HARRISON. Why does the gentleman from Illinois say that?

Mr. MANN. You can not get these employees, which never were intended to be included in the limitation, at the salary fixed in the limitation. The original limitation, in the main, was for employees embraced in schools where, as a rule, they are provided with quarters, light, and heat, and in many cases subsistence. That very frequently does not apply to these people, both as to matrons and farmers and stockmen. In many cases it is quite essential to get good farmers and good stockmen, and you can not bring those people within this limitation and do the work at all. I looked this matter up at one time very carefully.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman think it would give the commissioner or the Secretary full discretion as to how much he should pay these various employees if the law should be changed?

Mr. MANN. This limitation has been carried for years. I think it gives the Secretary full authority to pay large salaries, but I think, as a matter of fact, he does not pay large salaries except in employing first-class men, where you have to pay a reasonable salary. I think in the main all of the salaries are too small. It is very much the same class of work, or in many cases, as the work of the agricultural extension work in the South has been. It is not the same, but very much along that line.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I thought.

Mr. MANN. And I think the salaries paid are probably about the same. That is my recollection of it. I know I looked it up a few years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois says and not the justification of the committee I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of goods and supplies for the Indian Service, including inspection, pay of necessary employees, and all other expenses connected therewith, including advertising, storage, and transportation of Indian goods and supplies, $300,000: Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used for the maintenance of to exceed three permanent warehouses in the Indian Service: Provided further, That section 3709, Revised Statutes, in so far as that section requires that advertisement be made, shall apply only to those purchases and contracts for supplies or services, except personal services, for the Indian field service which exceed in amount the sum of $50 each, and section 23 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stats. L., 861), is hereby amended accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma or the gentleman from Texas or some of the committeemen why this new proviso is placed in the bill at the bottom of page 8?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is drawing attention to the item that excludes amounts under $50 from being advertised? Is that what the gentleman is asking about?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think that is apparent on the face of it. It would be an endless amount of trouble to advertise for any purchase under $50. If a man wanted to buy or sell a cow he would have to advertise, and if he wanted to trade a cow he would have to advertise.

Mr. HARRISON. Heretofore there has been no limitation, but everything has had to be advertised.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think that is true.

Mr. HARRISON. For any amount they would have to advertise?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. I will state that where the amount is less than $50 when you advertise the cost of the article is very much increased ordinarily.

Mr. HARRISON. Formerly there were five of these permanent warehouses.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. When were these warehouses first established?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. A great many years ago, but I do not remember exactly.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not remember exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the gentleman give me the year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is a number of years ago. I thought I could find it in the estimates, but I do not see it here. I do not think I have that information.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago I reported to Congress and had passed a bill reorganizing the Lighthouse Service, and among other provisions inserted in that bill was an authority to make purchases without advertising, where the purchase was under a certain amount, an essential provision, especially in the Lighthouse Service, making for both economy and efficiency. Since that time every department of the Government has been trying to get authority to do away with the necessity for advertising for small purchases. I think we have had or will have a provision authorizing certain officials in the Army, possibly, to purchase up to the extent of $500. If you want to buy a file for immediate use to sharpen a hoe, it is rather inconvenient to have to advertise for it. I do not say that is necessary now, but there are many purchases where delay and cost of advertising is expensive many more times than the cost of the article itself. In the Lighthouse Service we require an annual report to be made of every article that is purchased without advertising.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language "is hereby amended accordingly" in line 4, on page 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 4, strike out the words "is hereby amended accordingly."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, it is not amended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And change the comma to a period at the end of line 3.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk will attend to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 8, line 20, by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 20, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "one."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not be adopted. This matter has caused a great deal of trouble in Congress from time to time, and we have agreed upon this policy and I hope it will not be disturbed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, one of the gentlemen on the committee just said that the committee was with me, and now I find that the committee is not with me, so that I do not know just where I am. I find in the hearings in respect to this matter that there were formerly five of these warehouses carried throughout the country—one at Chicago, one in St. Louis, one at San Francisco, one at New York, and one at Omaha. Some years ago two of these warehouses were abolished—the one in New York and the one in Omaha. There are now three—one at Chicago, one at St. Louis, and one at San Francisco. Mr. Meritt before the committee had the following to say about this paragraph to a question propounded to him by the chairman:

Are you able to estimate the amount of savings effected by abolishing those two places?

Speaking of New York and San Francisco, he said he thought there would be a saving of at least $10,000. All through the hearing, with reference to the warehouses, it will be seen that most of these supplies are purchased and stored at Chicago or at St. Louis. I believe it is shown that at Chicago the weight of supplies shipped from the warehouse during the fiscal year 1915 was 31,000,000 pounds and in St. Louis 34,000,000 pounds, and that of those amounts there was handled in the warehouse in Chicago 3,768,000 pounds and in the warehouse at St. Louis 1,163,000 pounds, while at San Francisco there was much less handled. So that we are maintaining a warehouse at a cost of approximately $20,000, as I believe the hearings show, when the Indian Office purchased only three or four million dollars' worth of goods last year for the Indians, and practically all of these goods went through the warehouse either at Chicago or St. Louis. The reason why the warehouses at New York and San Francisco were abolished was in the interest of economy. They were costing too much money to maintain, as the Indians were not close to those places, and it seems to me if the reason was good there that the reason is just as good now to abolish two more of these places, and especially at San Francisco, because there are hardly any goods stored there. Now, if the committee, for which I have such a high regard, really wants to economize in that item, they can abolish two of these warehouses.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I think it is only necessary to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amount was overdrawn $33,000 last year, and Mr. Meritt says:

You will notice we have been overdrawing this fund for a number of years. It has been almost impossible to keep the amount down to a certain sum because of the difference in freight charges, and it is exceedingly difficult to estimate the exact amount that will be used; but we think that with the abolition of these two warehouses and the procuring of this legislation enabling us to buy locally, we will be able to bring the appropriation within the $300,000.

Mr. NORTON. And the total amount expended on account of Indian warehouses was $333,094.70? That will be smaller by about $10,000 for the next fiscal year?

Mr. MERITT. We think we can make a saving of at least $10,000 by the abolition of the two warehouses mentioned.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I find a statement made here in the hearings of expense at the Omaha warehouse during the past year. That expense was incurred before the Omaha warehouse was abolished. Subsequently the Indian Department used a warehouse belonging to the War Department there called the Government corral to store merchandise for transshipment, and no charge was made therefor, so that this charge made in these hearings is not fair toward the Omaha warehouse. The charge made here is up to the time the warehouse was abolished. The question of whether you can buy goods cheaper at one point or city than another is a question for argument. It has been shown conclusively that with or without the Government rates merchandise could be shipped to Indian points or final destination cheaper from Omaha or Kansas City than from any point in the Union. The commissioner's department has never been able to successfully contradict the freight-rate showing made to it.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman will permit, the object of the amendment I have offered does not affect Omaha.

Mr. LOBECK. I was not asking for Omaha, because that has been decided against us.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought possibly the gentleman——

Mr. LOBECK. But I want to say that the Indian Bureau used the Government warehouse in Omaha for the distribution of merchandise to Indian destinations all throughout the summer, without costing the Indian Department a cent, except for what help it had there. There is no rent. The rent shown in this hearing was rent up to the time when under the last law the Omaha warehouse was abolished, when Mr. Jordan, in charge of the office and warehouse at Omaha, was transferred to San Francisco last May, and the charge for rent, $399, which shows in this hearing, was up to that time.

The Omaha warehouse during its existence had a record for handling the merchandise assembled there for transshipment to Indian schools and agencies which will compare favorably with any Indian warehouse in the country for efficiency in service and cost of maintenance, and there has been no showing made that cost of supplies was less at any other city or warehouse. The Omaha merchant meets all competition with pleasure.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems—and it has been for years—a difficult matter to sever these warehouses from the Indian bill. I believe the record will show that an effort was made several years ago to reduce the number of warehouses. In the Indian appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, it was provided that only three warehouses should be paid for, but that provision was not complied with. In the hearings on the bill now before the committee the Assistant Commissioner of the Indian Bureau, Mr. Meritt, stated that he thought it might be economy to have but one warehouse. Still the warehouses have been such a prized part of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the past that he felt just at this time the department did not care to separate from all but one of them, and wished to continue during the next year with at least three warehouses. The hearings will show that one of the chief purposes of these warehouses has been to have places where sample goods might be brought and displayed and where the buyers for the Government might make selections and purchases. It occurs to me that for the reason that conditions in the wholesale trade have greatly changed during the past few years and that we have larger wholesale houses throughout the country to-day than in the past, and that most of our wholesale houses have large display rooms, the necessity of having a Government warehouse does not exist to-day as it did in years gone by. I am rather inclined to favor the amendment; in fact, I do favor and shall vote for the amendment proposed, to authorize but one warehouse. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has shown no particular necessity for more than one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division. I want to see who are in favor of economy.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the vote by which line 4, on page 9, was stricken out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to vacate the vote whereby the amendment was adopted striking out all of line 4, page 9. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. And I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners, $10,000.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on lines 16 and 17.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I reserve the point of order; and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the question?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I see in the evidence here that the witnesses testifying in the hearing——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. To what page does the gentleman refer?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Page 9. This is a provision for $10,000 for the expenses of a Board of Indian Commissioners. It is admitted in the hearing here by witnesses testifying, which indicates that there is no authorization for this appropriation. In fact, it is stated here in sections 2039 and 2072 that this board of commissioners is created without any salary. Is it not a fact——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The law itself states that they serve without salary, and it is only for traveling expenses and other expenses of the board of commissioners, including a secretary that they are obliged to employ.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Where is the authorization for including the expenses?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It runs back originally to 1868, if I remember.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read him the law. Section 2039 of the Revised Statutes provides:

There shall be a Board of Indian Commissioners, composed of not more than 10 persons, appointed by the President solely from men eminent for intelligence and philanthropy, and who shall serve without pecuniary compensation.

Section 2040 provides:

The board of commissioners mentioned in the preceding section shall have power to appoint one of their own number as secretary, who shall be entitled to such reasonable compensation as the board may designate, payable from any moneys appropriated for the expenses of the board.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, the gentleman does not mean to claim that this $10,000 goes to the secretary?

Mr. HAYDEN. His salary can be paid out of this amount under authority of law.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Do not the hearings here specify the items this money was paid out for last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They do not specify what it is to be paid out for this year.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Well the gentleman does not deny it is to be used for the same illegal purposes as heretofore?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I neither deny it or affirm it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The secretary is entitled to be paid out of money appropriated for the expenses of the board.

Mr. TRIBBLE. This sets forth that it is to pay the expenses of a board of commissioners, $10,000. There is nothing said about a secretary.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the law says that the secretary shall be entitled to such reasonable compensation as the board may designate, payable from any money appropriated for the expenses of the board. Now, we appropriate money for the expenses of the board, and under the authority of law the board has the right to hire a secretary and pay him a salary. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It may be clear to the gentleman, but it is not clear to me. It is shown in the hearings that last year nearly $9,000 went out for salaries, and the hearings show here that this board of commissioners has been traveling around over the country on junketing trips to San Francisco and elsewhere, and the commissioner held up the sum that one received and required it to be paid back into the Treasury, and here the gentleman proposes to defend it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the item is subject to a point of order. The law specifically provides for the appointment of a board of Indian commissioners and provides for a lot of duties which they may or shall perform. All of the law was not read by the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], though doubtless he could add, if he took the time, that the law specifically contemplates that these Indian commissioners shall travel throughout the country, that they shall go to Indian reservations, that they shall pay attention to the opening of bids for the purchase of supplies, that they shall know how the Government is treating the Indians, and what are the necessities of the Indians, in order that they may recommend to Congress and to the administration what ought to be done. If we are entitled to make the appropriation for their expenses, the law provides for that. As a matter of fact, the Board of Indian Commissioners, composed of gentlemen who, I think, are wholly disinterested, have rendered great service to the Government and to the Indians in times past, and doubtless will in the future. I think if my friend from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] would make an investigation as to the various reports which this board has made in the past he would modify his views very materially as to its value. I question whether there is any money expended by the Government in connection with the Indian Service which is of more value, both to the Government and to the Indians, than the money expended for the Board of Indian Commissioners. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] makes the point of order to the paragraph on lines 16 and 17. The section as quoted by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Chair thinks, wholly covers the authorization of law for this appropriation, and therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of judges of Indian courts where tribal relations now exist, $8,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the item:

For pay of judges of Indian courts where tribal relations now exist, $8,000.

May I inquire of the committee how many of these judges there are?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have the statement right here somewhere. It says:

Several years ago there was appropriated for the pay of Indian judges, $12,000. This was reduced to $10,000, and then again to $8,000, and restrictions added that these courts are to be maintained only where tribal relations existed.

This has been the law for a number of years.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask what is the salary of these judges?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Eighty-four dollars a year. That is a munificent sum to give a judge.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is a very poor sum. How many days out of the month do they work?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have cases to try just as other magistrates would have, and they have had that to do from time immemorial, and the Indians would consider they had been greatly injured if we should take these judges away from them. It was for the purpose of having sanitary conditions surrounding their camps and places of residence. They are elected by the Indians. It is an Indian court.

Mr. HARRISON. How many of these are in Oklahoma?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. None.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The tribal relations have been dissolved there.

Mr. HARRISON. Where are the most of these Indian judges located?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the Dakotas and in Montana, I think. They are on reservations where the land has not been divided among the Indians.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Permit me to state that they have the Indian courts in the Indian villages in New Mexico to the extent of about 8 or 10. They have a government of their own, similar to a municipal government in the city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes, just in order to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ] may have two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the character of these men who act as judges out there?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. They are just like the other Indians.

Mr. HARRISON. Just like an ordinary justice?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Not as much, I suppose, but a man of fair understanding usually. One of the chiefs acts as judge.

Mr. HARRISON. Are they appointed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or by whom?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Usually by the superintendent.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the superintendent in making these appointments go on the recommendation of the tribe?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes; they usually elect a man.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will call the gentleman's attention to the hearings on page 96. It says they are usually selected by the tribal council or the superintendent.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. They are a sort of mayor.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman is not in favor of striking out this item, I presume?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not care anything about it. We have very little to do with those courts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of six Indian Service inspectors, exclusive of one chief inspector, at salaries not to exceed $2,500 per annum and actual traveling expenses, and $3 per diem in lieu of subsistence when actually employed on duty in the field, $30,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. How is the chief inspector of the Indian Service inspectors paid? Out of what fund is he paid? I see this provision is "For pay of six Indian Service inspectors, exclusive of one chief inspector." Where is the provision in law for the chief inspector, and how does he get his money?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What page of the bill is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. MANN. Page 10, line 12.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The salaries are stated there. They are $2,500 per annum and $3 per day in lieu of subsistence, and so forth.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My recollection is, Mr. Chairman, that the chief inspector is carried on the legislative bill, although I would not be positive about it.

Mr. MANN. Why would you put in here "exclusive of one chief inspector," then?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This amount, I presume, is only to be paid to the assistant inspectors.

Mr. MANN. Plainly, if the chief inspector is carried in the legislative bill, that language does not belong here. You make provision here for the pay of six Indian Service inspectors at a salary of $2,500 each. That covers the six inspectors. It would not make any difference if we provided for 6,000 somewhere else. What I want to know is whether that provides for six and the chief inspector?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not think it provides for the chief inspector. I think he is provided for outside of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I take it that language like this is sent to the committee by the department. The committee itself is not to be criticized because it brings in sometimes very crude language that no one can tell the meaning of, except the man who wrote it, and he can only tell what he intended it to mean. That language can not mean anything within the comprehension of anybody here, I think, "exclusive of one chief inspector."

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, on page 102 of the justifications it is stated that these five officers are required to supplement the special force of supervisors. From that I would conclude that the chief is included. You will find that on page 102 of the hearings, where they speak of five inspectors.

Mr. MANN. The language heretofore has been "For pay for six inspectors." Now, you say, "exclusive of one chief inspector." I want to know whether that is intended to add a man or whether it is thrown in with the intention of adding nothing.

Mr. KONOP. The commissioner, on page 102 of the justifications, speaks of five officers. That is all I know about this.

Mr. MANN. After the very careful consideration which the committee evidently gave to this subject I will withdraw my inquiry.

Mr. NORTON. That language is the same as the existing law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that there are seven names given here on page 9 of the hearings. I presume that includes the chief inspector.

Mr. KONOP. In the bill of last year the language of the House did not include that provision, but the Senate inserted the words "including one chief inspector."

Mr. MANN. Well, I bow in deference to the Senate for once. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees having any right, title, or interest in any trust or restricted property, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, $90,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use not to exceed $20,000 for the employment of additional clerks in the Indian Office in connection with the work of determining the heirs of deceased Indians, and examining their wills, out of the $90,000 appropriated herein: Provided further, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the Osage Indians nor to the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma: And provided further, That hereafter upon a determination of the heir to any trust or restricted Indian property or after approval by the Secretary of any will covering such trust or restricted property, there shall be paid by such heirs, or by the beneficiaries under such will, or from the estate of the decedent, or from the proceeds of sale of the allotment, or from any trust funds belonging to the estate of the decedent, the sum of $15, which amount shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States, and a report shall be made annually to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the first Monday of December, of all moneys collected and deposited as herein provided: Provided further, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any inherited trust allotment or allotments are capable of partition to the advantage of the heirs, he may cause such lands to be partitioned among them, patents in fee to be issued to the competent heirs for their shares, and truts patents to be issued to the incompetent heirs for the lands respectively or jointly set apart to them, the trust period to terminate in accordance with the terms of the original patent.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no doubt that a change of existing law is made here in several instances.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Mississippi reserve his point of order for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember the reason for this?

Mr. HARRISON. They broadened the statute and changed the law.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. As stated by Mr. Meritt, it is intended to give the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Commissioner a broader discretion in these allotment and trust-fund cases.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will recall that a few years ago there was a good deal of discussion in reference to the frauds that had been practiced upon Indian minors and Indian estates by certain people in Oklahoma, including some judges and attorneys. There has been some legislation in Oklahoma since that time, designed to remedy or prevent those frauds—not entirely satisfactory to many people who wish to preserve the rights of the Indians.

This plan was adopted of permitting the Indian Department to protect the rights of the minors down there in these estates. I will say candidly to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am sure he was on the other side of the question, in favor of this proposition, when it came up, because we were endeavoring to prevent the natural tendency, to say the least, of white people in a new territory where there were many Indians to get away all they can from the Indians, and then some in addition.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice in reading it that this does not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Nor to the Osage Indians.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in view of that, I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That not to exceed $200,000 of applicable appropriations made herein for the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of superintendents, farmers, physicians, field matrons, allotting, irrigation, and other employees in the Indian field service: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 may be used in the purchase of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and not to exceed $30,000 for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. The bill last year carried the item of $200,000 for the maintenance and repair and operation of automobiles, and so forth, and I see the bill carries the same amount this year. Are the gentlemen on the committee entirely satisfied that this amount is sufficient, in view of the extraordinary increase in the cost of gasoline and tires, and so forth? If $200,000 was required for the current year in the estimation of the committee a year ago, how are you going to get along with $200,000 for next year? If the committee are able to give information to the House and to the country at large, telling how an automobile can be operated during the next year as cheaply as during the past year, the committee will confer untold benefits upon a very large number of people.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. I do not own an automobile, but I think we ought to know about that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Not owning an automobile myself, I am not able to give the gentleman any information.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; but the gentleman is a moving spirit upon the great Committee on Indian Affairs, and besides that he represents a region that produces a very large proportion of the oil for which we have to pay fancy prices after it has been properly refined. Now, if in the estimation of the committee it took $200,000 a year ago, when gasoline was selling at 9 or 10 cents a gallon out there in the West, and when automobile tires were not very high, how are you going to get along with the maintenance and operation of the same number of automobiles next year, with gasoline running, the gentleman from Oregon says, out in his country as high as 60 cents or perhaps $2 a gallon by this time, and certainly above 20 cents the country over; and with automobile tires just having gone up 10 to 20 per cent and liable to go up again, what are you going to do?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. One reason why we did not increase this amount was that the department did not ask for any more.

Mr. MANN. When the department made its estimate, it did not know what the necessary amount would be. Did the committee give any consideration or did the gentleman from Oklahoma, representing the great Oklahoma oil fields, give any consideration to the question as to how we ought to go about it to keep the price of gasoline down to reasonable limits?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I suppose some of my constituents would not be very much interested in keeping the price of gasoline down. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I suspected that that would be the gentleman's very natural answer.

Mr. KONOP. The usual way in such cases is to have a committee of Congress investigate, and then the price goes down.

Mr. MANN. If an automobile could be operated with gas of a certain kind, instead of gas produced from gasoline, then it would be sufficient to have an investigating committee; because, goodness knows, there would be plenty of gas of that kind then. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman mean the preparedness gas that is being produced over the country so much now?

Mr. MANN. No; I am not referring to the President of the United States, though it is quite evident that the gentleman from Texas is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; I am not.

Mr. MANN. I have some respect for the President. I do not refer to him as a mere gas-producing machine. I see that the gentleman from Texas does.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FERRIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had, on January 28, 1916, approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 1773. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Warfield, Ky., and Kermit, W. Va.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Texas withdraws the pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of section 4 of the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stats. L., 132), as prohibits granting permission in writing or otherwise to any Indian or Indians on any Indian reservation to go into the State of Texas, under any pretext whatever, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the paragraph. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who is opposed to the President, to tell us why any Indian should want to go into the State of Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Very few of them have gone there. We have in that State only the original tribe of Alabama Indians, and I understand that there are only about 200 of them. I hope that the Government will never get them under supervision and control. I have opposed that all the way through, and I hope we will never have an Indian agency in the State or have a Texas Indian under the supervision and control of the United States Government.

The gentleman from Illinois refers to the paragraph which has just been read, which proposes to repeal section 4 of the act of May 11, 1880, which prohibits reservation Indians from going into the State of Texas.

Immediately after the Civil War the Secretary of War had control of these Indians. They were known as blanket or wild Indians. They were the Comanches, Kiowas, and other wild tribes west of the ninety-eighth meridian.

Mr. MANN. That was in 1880.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Those Indians were on the warpath, and about once a month, during moonlight nights, we would have a raid from them. They were required by the War Department not to cross the Red River. That was under a provision of law which permitted officers of the Army to set bounds for those Indians. But this is an old law, which has now become useless. I will state that I lived within 10 miles of the Comanche and Kiowa Reservation. Geronimo's band of Apache Indians, who were for many years prisoners on a military reservation, have been to our town frequently to trade. They were, however, under the supervision and control of another Indian named Quanah Parker.

Mr. MANN. If Geronimo was lured into the gentleman's town at some time, was that the cause of the outbreak? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I am trying to explain, this law has become useless, and for that reason the department has asked that it be repealed.

Mr. MANN. I do not quite understand what the gentleman means when he says the law is useless. If the law is useless, there is no object in repealing it. Does it keep the Indians out of Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does not.

Mr. MANN. Why, no! No Indian wants to go there. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Possibly not; and in the past we felt that we were honored by their not coming there as much as they wished to, because when they used to come there we chased them back.

Mr. MANN. If we could segregate all these peace Indians in Texas who are afraid to fight, possibly it would be a good thing to pass a law to keep them in Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. At the time this law was passed the Indians were on the warpath, and when they came to our side of the river we chased them back. In fact, the first time I ever crossed the Red River I was with the Texas Rangers. We crossed the river, at the risk of being put in the Kansas penitentiary if we had been caught; but we took our chances on that, and were not captured.

Mr. MANN. While I have the greatest respect for Texas and her citizens, yet I think probably, judging by some of the people from Texas whom I have seen, it would not hurt the State very much to have some of these blanket Indians go down there; so I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the reason why we want the law repealed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last year when this appropriation bill was up I offered this paragraph as an amendment on the floor and asked that it be adopted. I made the same appeal at that time that my good friend from Texas makes to-day. He had it in his power at that time to make the point of order, and he made it to this item. Not only did I appeal to him in the interests of Texas, but other men did, not to make the point of order because he knew as he knows now that it was subject to a point of order. If it was not for the good graces of my friend from Illinois in withdrawing the point of order, saying it is a dead letter, he could make it and it would be sustained by the Chair. Now, I want to congratulate my friend from Texas on his change of front on this particular proposition. Evidently it was the argument used last time which created in his breast a conviction that caused him to sway the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. MURRAY, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. CARTER, to have this incorporated in this bill and to ask of the committee at this time to incorporate it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi is some younger in the House than I am.

Mr. HARRISON. A good deal younger.

Mr. MANN. It will be of some consolation to him, I think, if I say that my observation and experience is that you never get anything really soaked into the Committee on Indian Affairs short of a year. [Laughter.] The argument that you make to-day may appeal to them a year from now. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2 of the act approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. L., p. 1221), entitled "An act providing for the allotment and distribution of Indian tribal funds," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the pro rata share of any Indian who is mentally or physically incapable of managing his or her own affairs may be withdrawn from the Treasury in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and expended for the benefit of such Indian under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the said Secretary may prescribe."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the lands, buildings, fixtures, and all property rights granted to the State of Colorado for educational purposes by section 5 of the act of Congress approved April 4, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 273), may, in lieu of the use designated in said grant, be utilized by said State for the care of the insane, as an agricultural experiment station, or for such other public purposes as may be authorized by the legislature of the State: Provided, That Indians shall always be admitted to such institutions free of charge and upon an equality with white persons.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. The gentleman will have to make a pretty good explanation to get by the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will try to explain this matter, I hope to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Illinois. The act of Congress granting the Teller Indian School, at Grand Junction, to the State of Colorado was passed April 4, 1910. At that time the school had become practically abandoned. The Interior Department and Indian Bureau and the Indian Affairs Committee of the House had decided to discontinue nonreservation Indian schools; so they were not using it much for Indians at that time. The Government agents in charge of the property had allowed the full amount of the Government water rights from the canal above the land to run on to this land practically all of the time, both when it was needed and when it was not needed, so that the land had become seeped; it was so full of alkali that the land had become almost worthless in that form. It would not grow anything. It even affected the foundations of the brick building. The irrigation above the land and the lack of proper drainage also affected the land injuriously. The Government intended, as I say, to abandon this school under a general policy of withdrawing the Indian children from the nonreservation schools and placing them in reservation schools. So there was a provision put in the Indian appropriation bill of April 4, 1910, at my request and with the approval of the Interior Department, ceding the property to the State of Colorado, to be used for educational purposes.

At that time I and the Senators and other Representatives from Colorado expected that the State would convert this property into a State normal school, or at least establish a branch agricultural experiment station there, but afterwards the funds of the State were in such a condition that they could not build a normal school. We have five State educational institutions in our State already. I may say that Colorado has practically all the State institutions of every kind that the rich, Eastern States have, with only about 10 per cent of the revenue to support them. As a matter of fact, the State has not during the past five years had the money, nor has it had the pupils, to warrant another educational institution at this place. It would have required a large amount of money to repair and rehabilitate these buildings. On May 31, 1911, the governor of Colorado accepted the grant in compliance with that act (36 Stat. L., 273), but the State has not yet complied with that grant, and the last legislature memorialized Congress to modify and enlarge the grant whereby the institution is given to the State for educational purposes so as to vest the title in the State and provide that the property may be used for such purposes as the General Assembly of Colorado may provide. So I introduced a bill, H. R. 19, on the first day of this session to carry out the wish of my State as expressed by the last legislature; and the language of this paragraph is practically the same as my bill. Although my bill does not contain the provision concerning the care of insane Indians, however, I may say that the legislature had in view the using of these buildings for a branch insane asylum, and we also may want to use some of the land for an agricultural experiment station, if it can be made suitable. The State wants to try to reclaim that seep land and drain it so as to make it productive and valuable.

I submitted my bill to Gov. Carlson, of Colorado, and asked him to write me an official statement as to why the State had not complied with the former grant of Congress and why we want this modification of that grant. The governor has written me a very frank and clear statement of the situation and the objects of the State in regard to this property. I will insert his letter to me in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF COLORADO,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Denver, January 20, 1916.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TAYLOR: We are greatly interested in the bill introduced by you having for its object the amendment to the act of Congress granting the property known as the Grand Junction Indian School to Colorado, so as to permit the State to use the property for other purposes than as an educational institution.

It has been suggested to me that some objection might be made on the ground that this school was built by the Government to afford educational opportunities to the Indians of Colorado, and that it would be an injustice to these wards of the Government if its character were changed. This objection, if it should be made, is absolutely without justification. It is probable that at the time the school was built there were some Indians within close proximity, but at the present time the only Indians that I know of on the western slope of Colorado are on the Ute Reservation, which is in the very extreme southwest corner of the State, and I believe another reservation some distance south of this. Altogether there are not a thousand Indians in the entire State, and in my many visits to Mesa and adjoining counties I do not remember ever having seen one. As a matter of fact, the United States Government had practically abandoned the school before it was transferred to Colorado. I do not believe it possible to induce any practicable number of Indians to come several hundred miles from their reservations and attend this school, no matter how attractive the curriculum might be made. It would certainly be a most uneconomical procedure, even if willing Indians were found.

You may be asked why Colorado has not fully complied with the previous grant. The answer is found in the fact that the buildings were simply unfit for use, on account of the seepage of water into them from grounds which were badly in need of systematic drainage. Shortly after the transfer of this property to the State $5,000 was spent for extension teaching in the district and for keeping the property in repair. A very careful drainage survey was made of the land, records were kept of the level of the ground water, and from the results of all of these a plan was worked out for the drainage of the ground. This plan was submitted to the nineteenth general assembly, which on account of the chaotic condition of the finances of the State at that time was unable to make the necessary appropriation.

There is a strong demand that these buildings be used as an insane asylum for the western slope of Colorado. I presume you will point out to the committee and to Congress the great expense of transporting insane patients from the western slope to the State asylum at Pueblo, and so I will not dwell upon this feature. At the present time there are 16 counties on the western slope unable to place their insane in a State institution.

Last year the expense to the different counties of the State in maintaining their insane in private institutions was $92,701.38. I have not available the proportion of this borne by the western slope, but from the large number of western-slope counties represented in the total amount you will see it must have amounted to considerable.

The twentieth general assembly made an appropriation of $5,000 to take up the drainage of the property. The lands have been included in the drainage district and surveys are being made of this district by the United States Reclamation Service. Actual work on drainage will be begun just as soon as the main drainage channels have been located by the surveys. When once drained the property will again be serviceable for school purposes The buildings have suffered through nonuse, but can be put in serviceable shape at very reasonable cost, excepting in the case of very old buildings, where cost of repairs will prove excessive.

It will be a pleasure to me to furnish you on demand any further facts desired, and you may use this letter before the committee having the bill in charge if you so desire.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE A. CARLSON, Governor.

Mr. MANN. How much land is there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. One hundred and seventy acres.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that they could get an insane asylum and an agricultural experiment station on 170 acres of land?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I can not speak with absolute certainty as to just what the Colorado Legislature will do. But I know we expect to make the best use of the property that we can.

Mr. MANN. You are just fishing, taking the land for what it may be worth.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The land is not worth anything now; but we are going to try the best we can to utilize this property and put it to some beneficial public use. It is no use to either the Government or the State the way it is now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know whether they will use it for an insane asylum or an agricultural college, or a place to herd sheep.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We will have to spend considerable money on it before we can use it for anything.

Mr. MANN. How can the gentleman tell? There is no limitation here. First, you ask for it for a normal school, and I remember the gentleman's very persuasive speech. I can remember the eloquent remarks he made on the subject on how necessary it was to educate the youth of the land to provide teachers, and therefore we ought to give them the place for a normal school. Now, they want it for an insane asylum and an agricultural experiment station, or anything else that the legislature happens to think of.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Sells, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has sent Mr. Kneal, an Indian agent, over there just a few days ago and he made an exhaustive examination of this property as it is to-day, and he reports that the Government does not want this property at all for any purpose, and that it is of no use under the sun for an Indian school or anything else, and that it will cost the State of Colorado $50,000 in money before she can do anything with it. It is a deplorable situation that property upon which the Government has spent nearly $700,000 should have been allowed to run down until it is, in its present condition, comparatively worthless. The State is not getting a very big bargain in taking the property for nothing.

Mr. MANN. It is never very difficult to get one department officer to say, if the Government has got something of value that it does not want to use, that it ought to give it away.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman listen and permit me to read the memorial of the Colorado Legislature on this subject?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I do not pay much attention to memorials of legislatures or a memorial of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Colorado be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that the time of the gentleman from Colorado be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The memorial of our legislature to which I refer is as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 5 (by Senator Kluge), that the grant of the Grand Junction School heretofore made to the State of Colorado by the United States for educational purposes be enlarged so as to include charitable and other purposes.

Whereas by section 5 of chapter 140, approved April 4, 1910, the Sixty-first Congress of the United States of America did grant to the State of Colorado the property known as the Grand Junction School, including the lands, buildings, and fixtures pertaining to said school, provided that said lands and buildings should be held and maintained by the State of Colorado as an institution of learning, and that Indian pupils should at all times be admitted to such school free of charge of tuition and on terms of equality with white pupils; and

Whereas the governor of the State of Colorado did duly file an acceptance of said grant with the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the terms and conditions of said grant, and the said school has been under the control of the State of Colorado since said acceptance; and

Whereas the State of Colorado has now five separate institutions of learning that are in active operation in different parts of the State, and the needs of which, financially, are constantly increasing; and

Whereas the State of Colorado has only one asylum for the insane, being the insane asylum located at Pueblo, Colo., and said asylum is now greatly overcrowded, and there is not room for the insane patients of the State; and

Whereas costs and charges for transporting patients from that part of Colorado west of the Continental Divide to the said insane asylum are excessive and constitute an undue burden upon the people of the western slope of Colorado; and

Whereas the said the Grand Junction Indian School is centrally located on the said western slope, so as to accommodate patients from that portion of the State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of the twentieth general assembly and the house of representatives thereof concurring, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, requested to enlarge the grant heretofore made by it to the State of Colorado, of said the Grand Junction School so as to vest the title thereto in the State of Colorado, and to provide that the same may be used for such purposes as the General Assembly of Colorado may provide; be it further

Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Secretary of the Interior, and that this resolution be entered of record of the twentieth general assembly; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Representatives of Colorado in the Congress of the United States.

Approved April 9, 1915, 11.50 a. m.

MOSES E. LEWIS,
President of the Senate.
PHILIP B. STEWART,
Speaker of the House.
GEORGE A. CARLSON,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

(Indorsed:) Filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Colorado, on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1915, at 2.35 o'clock p. m. Recorded in book —, page —.

JOHN E. RAMER,
Secretary of State.
By GEORGE M. WILLIAMS, Deputy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that if it were in order for a Member of the House here to rise and offer a memorial, we would probably pass 50 of them a day upon every conceivable subject of which the human mind could take cognizance, and not any of us would know what they were about. That is the way with the legislatures.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But the Legislature of Colorado has not memorialized Congress without knowing all about this matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Legislature of Colorado has sent more memorials to Congress about more things about which it knows nothing than any other legislature of the country, at this session of Congress, occupying page after page of the RECORD. Of course, this was something they had an interest in. Usually they have memorialized Congress in respect to some matter that is none of their business.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It seems to be true that the Western States memorialize Congress more than the other States do. But I have not observed that Colorado exercises that right any more than others. The legislatures have a right, in fact a duty, to express to Congress the sentiment of their States, and we should give those memorials due consideration. At the present time Colorado has an insane asylum in the city of Pueblo. That insane asylum has for years been overcrowded. There are several hundred insane patients scattered around over the State of Colorado in private institutions and in jails or one place and another, and the State wants to take these buildings and repair them and use them as a branch insane asylum to properly care for these unfortunates.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I can say one thing here that might be applicable—perhaps they would better have the insane asylum conduct these agricultural experiments. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know about that; but the same provision is contained in this bill that is in the present law, allowing the insane Indians to go there upon the same terms as the white, if the Government wants to put them there. We are not trying to escape any obligations, if there are any, to the Indians. I am not sure but what the Indians would have more use for the property as an insane asylum than they have as an educational institution, because of its being a non-reservation school.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman would not say that that would apply to Colorado generally?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; that would not apply to Colorado by any means. We will beneficially use this property if Congress will give us the permission. But, of course, we can not spend $50,000 on the property unless Congress modifies the grant and authorizes us to make this change. I presented this matter very fully to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and obtained the approval of all of them, and I hope that the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order and let us adopt this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, once again I am overpersuaded by the eloquence of the gentleman from Colorado just as I was the last time when he wanted this property for another purpose, and I shall withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

SEC. 2. For support and civilization of Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, including pay of employees, $330,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I want to ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] a question. Three hundred and thirty thousand dollars are appropriated in this item for the support and civilization of Indians in Arizona. How many Indians are there in Arizona?

Mr. HAYDEN. About 42,000.

Mr. HARRISON. How many in New Mexico?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think there are 20,000 or 21,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice in the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended to the committee a provision of law to enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the condition of the Indians living in Mississippi and report to Congress on the first Monday of December as to their need for additional land and school facilities, and that $1,000 was proposed to be appropriated for that purpose, to be immediately available. He offered his justification for that, and the chairman asked him the question, "About how many Indians are there in Mississippi," to which he replied that there are 1,235 living in that State. The question I want to propound to the gentleman, because this Arizona and New Mexico item for $330,000 is clearly subject to a point of order, as well as many other items under headings of other States for support and civilization of Indians, including, I notice, under the Oklahoma heading items for similar gratuities. May I ask the gentleman—and I respect him highly, both on account of his ability and congeniality—does he not think that the committee is a little unfair to the Indians of Mississippi when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommends to them a provision that carries $1,000 not for the support and civilization of the Mississippi Indians but merely to investigate their condition, that the committee should turn it down, brush it aside, and go on and write into the bill $330,000 for the Arizona and New Mexico Indians, not for their investigation but for their support and civilization, as well as carrying similar provisions for other States that are represented on the House Indian Committee?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that I was under the impression that the recommendation of the department relative to the thousand dollars for the Indians in Mississippi had been adopted by the committee, and I should be very glad to vote for such an amendment if the gentleman would offer it on the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that it was subject to a point of order, and some gentleman on the committee made the point of order and the Chair sustained it.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the gentleman can not get out of it on the question of a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was new legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. For the reason that there was just incorporated into this bill a provision that repealed a law passed in 1880, I think it was, that prohibited the Indians from Oklahoma going into the gentleman's State of Texas, and that was incorporated in this bill when the gentleman knew it was subject to a point of order, because he had made a point of order to a similar amendment that I offered last year. It matters not now whether it is subject to a point of order or not. This provision carrying the appropriation of $330,000 for the Arizona and New Mexico Indians is subject to a point of order, and I want to say to the chairman of the committee as well as to this committee that, knowing the condition of the Indians in my State, knowing that by this bill they get no relief, I am not going to be as unfair, I am not going to be as unjust as the Committee on Indian Affairs has been in this matter—when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has recommended to the committee the incorporation of a thousand-dollar provision merely to investigate the conditions down there, which recommendation has been turned down by the committee.

I say I am not going to be as unfair as the gentleman is, because I have it within my power to make the point of order—for it will be sustained, because it is conceded not to be authorized by law—and wipe out this $330,000 for these Indians in Arizona and New Mexico. I think too much of the Indians of this country and have their welfare too much at heart. I am going to be fair and more just than the committee, and will therefore withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman expect——

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman wants me to make it, I will do so.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I still reserve the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman want to insist on the amendment for the $1,000 for the Indians in Mississippi? If he does, I will tell him that I think the committee really struck that out in order that the gentleman might offer the amendment and make a speech. That, I think, is about all the committee had in mind when it was stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman is very courteous and gracious. I know he does not like for me to speak that much. He can not offer that as an excuse. The gentleman knows the facts bear down too heavily upon him and his committee for that, and the gentleman knows there is an explanation due this House for their action in turning down a little recommendation for the needy, poor Mississippi Indians, under the circumstances, and he can not brush it aside in that manner.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There is no attempt to brush anything aside, and if the gentleman will permit me to say, without violating the rules of the House, something had happened in the committee. I will say to the gentleman that I protested against that item going out of the bill, and I insisted it should remain. It was thrown out over my protest.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi answer a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. NORTON. How long have the Indians in Mississippi been without Government aid?

Mr. HARRISON. Always; they have never received any Government aid.

Mr. NORTON. Never have been self-supporting?

Mr. HARRISON. Why, they have supported themselves only by hunting, fishing, what people would give them, and by working at times in the fields. They have not been as fortunate as the Indians in the gentleman's State in receiving support from the Government.

Mr. NORTON. They have been self-supporting?

Mr. HARRISON. Always.

Mr. NORTON. For many years?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think the Government at this time should pursue a policy of hunting up these Indians, who have been self-supporting for a hundred years, and offer to them Federal aid?

Mr. HARRISON. There is no man in this House who knows my views in reference to these poor Indians better than the gentleman from North Dakota, because I have spoken before his committee for hours and hours, giving him the views I entertain in reference to this matter. I am not of the opinion that the Government of the United States at this time should appropriate money for the Indians in Mississippi, and the gentleman knows the reason why I am not in favor of that. I believe they are entitled to share in the funds of the Choctaw Tribe, and I have not favored up to now even a bill introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], that would give the Mississippi Choctaws land to be paid for out of the Treasury of the United States, for the reason that I know the Representative from Oklahoma would have the Government pay them and would not have their own tribe pay them. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to further answer the question——

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. It is in order that the Treasury of the United States be protected that I am making the fight I am, because other gentlemen have seen that it is a question of time if all the funds of the Choctaw Tribe are dissipated then they are bound to come to the Government of the United States for aid.

Mr. NORTON. Then the gentleman does not purpose to have the Government extend any Federal aid to the Indians in Mississippi in reference to this $1,000 appropriation which the gentleman asks for——

Mr. HARRISON. I did not ask for it; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs asked for it; and let me say to the gentleman that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—and I dislike to say it very much—but it looks to me that he is partial in this matter. The gentleman will recall last year when this fight was made on the floor of the House, there came a report into this House, just before the vote was taken, which was signed by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, and the gentleman knows, and this House knows, that when those reports are made they are made by some clerk in the office and not by the Secretary or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Let me say further to the gentleman: I asked the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to let the Mississippi delegation be heard, or some of us, in support of our contention about this matter before any report was made to your committee, and I have not, up to this good day, received any word from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to come up and he would let us be heard in the matter, and it strikes me very much like there is some partiality about the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to limit debate on this paragraph to five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to that, because the gentleman may be so gratuitous in his remarks I might want to say something in reply, and I would ask that it be made 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate has been limited; debate has been already exhausted. Is there objection to the gentleman having five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have always been very much interested during my short service here in Congress in what the gentleman from Mississippi has had to say in presenting the purported claims of the Choctaws in Mississippi for a part of the lands and funds of the Choctaws in Oklahoma. From the forceful and able manner in which the gentleman from Mississippi has presented his subject as I have frequently heard it presented by him I have been forced to believe and am now fully convinced that if the Choctaws in Mississippi had even the smallest peg on which to hang any just and reasonable claim to a right to share in either the funds or the lands and other property of Oklahoma Choctaws that claim would have been long since recognized and conceded by the Congress.

It would have been granted by this Congress long before this time. There is no man that I have heard in this House who has shown himself more able to present a poor claim more favorably than the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

I do not believe that this House should concur in a recommendation of anybody, not excepting the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for an appropriation to seek out in some State a few Indians that the United States may make appropriations to aid, particularly Indians who for 50 years or more have been self-supporting and who have made their own livelihood without any aid from State or Federal Government. That is exactly the kind of policy that the Government should to-day be trying to escape rather than to enter upon. While I did not make a point of order against the proposed appropriation of $1,000 to investigate the conditions among the Indians of Mississippi, if the matter had come to a vote in the committee I certainly should have voted against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi make the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the work of constructing the irrigation system for the irrigation of the lands of the Pima Indians in the vicinity of Sacaton, on the Gila River Indian Reservation, within the limit of cost fixed by the act of March 3, 1905, $10,000; and for maintenance and operation of the pumping plants and canal systems, $10,000; in all, $20,000, reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 522), and to remain available until expended.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] whether these expenditures are to be made on and about the pumping plant that was built by the Reclamation Service?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. This is the very extensive plant that the service built and that we paid for?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Reimbursing the Reclamation Service for it. My recollection is that for a long time the Indians refused to use any of this water?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. Insisting that the water carried a good deal af alkali and that it injured their land?

Mr. HAYDEN. Of late years the Indians have been growing Egyptian cotton and other crops very successfully with this water, and the prejudice they had against it has largely disappeared. I think credit is due in a large measure to the very efficient superintendent they now have on that reservation in inducing these Indians to use this water.

Mr. MONDELL. They are now actually using this water, are they?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MONDELL. The plant was supposed to be complete. The Reclamation Service built a very complete and very expensive plant and dug the canals and laterals, and left the work in what was supposed to be a very perfect and very complete condition.

Mr. HAYDEN. I never heard that. I always understood that the main canal was constructed and a number of pumping plants installed, but that the smaller laterals for carrying the water to the land have not been built until of late.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice the item is supposed to be reimbursable. As a matter of fact, it is probably true, is it not, that these particular Indians will not be able to reimburse the Government for this expenditure?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not think it would be possible for the Pima Indians to reimburse the Government in the near future. They are very industrious Indians, and have progressed as fast as they can, considering the hardships under which they have labored. It is not to be expected they can repay any money right away.

Mr. MONDELL. Taking into consideration the suggestion of what we will do in irrigating further lands on this reservation, and the fact that some of the lands have not any value until irrigated, there is not much hope that they will reimburse the Government for this expense?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not in the near future; that is certain.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to understand a little more about this reimbursable proposition, which I have been trying to have put in bills for years. Is not this expense in a way a charge upon the Indian land there?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the Indians continue to own the land and use it, taking care of it themselves, the funds will probably not be reimbursable as long as that continues, but if the Indians should endeavor or propose to dispose of the land, especially to white settlers, would it not necessarily be the case that out of the proceeds of a sale the Government would be reimbursed for its original expense?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman correctly quotes the terms of the act mentioned in the bill, referring to reimbursement.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing, as long as they support themselves, to make this provision, but it does seem to me that in these irrigation schemes the time ought to come when the Indians can maintain the plants. It is not a very encouraging feature for the gentleman to say, "we will spend a million or half a million or two millions or $100,000 constructing an irrigation system for Indians, in order that they may earn money and have a livelihood, and be better off than they were before," and then, after having devoted that much money for that purpose, continue to spend the money to operate the plant year after year—a permanent annual expense against the Government, which can only be made on the theory that the original expenditure was a gross waste of money. Conceding that these Indians at this plant are doing a good work, is there not a time coming when they will be able to make enough, over and above other expenses of their own, to maintain the operation of the plant?

Mr. HAYDEN. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that I was on this reservation last summer and I asked that very question of the superintendent in charge. He said that he was very anxious to see the time come when the Indians would pay for the maintenance of the project, that he thought it would be a good thing for them to have a sense of responsibility, that they might know that it costs money to pump water, and that they ought to be careful in the use of the plant.

The gentleman should understand that originally the Indians refused to have anything to do with this pumping plant, so that it was necessary to make an appropriation to get the water pumped and used. Now that they are using it, I do not believe that after a few years there will be any reason why the Indians should not pay the charges for maintenance.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and repair of necessary channels and laterals for the utilization of water in connection with the pumping plant for irrigation purposes on the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz., as provided in the act of April 4, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 273), for the purpose of securing an appropriation of water for the irrigation of approximately 150,000 acres of land and for maintaining and operating the pumping plant, $15,000, reimbursable as provided in said act, and to remain available until expended: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be prepared plans and specifications showing the approximate cost of the construction of the necessary irrigation works for the reclamation of all of the irrigable lands on the Colorado River Indian Reservation in Arizona and California, which plans and specifications, together with a report upon the feasibility of irrigating the lands within said reservation, shall be submitted to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1916, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable. In said report the said secretary shall recommend a method for the disposal of the surplus and unallotted lands within said reservation and a plan for the repayment of the cost of the necessary irrigation work. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this proviso there is hereby appropriated the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending.

Mr. MONDELL. The point of order is withheld, I understand.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I notice the proviso in this paragraph proposes an investigation, the preparation of plans, estimates of cost of construction of necessary work for the reclamation of all the irrigable lands on the Colorado River Indian Reservation, in Arizona and California, and so forth. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] if it is not true that the question of the irrigation of these lands has heretofore been pretty carefully considered, and it is probable that the situation is such that no successful project could be carried out for the irrigation of all the lands of this reservation unless there should be built some very large storage works on the headwaters of the Colorado?

Mr. HAYDEN. On the contrary, I will say there has never been any consideration given by the Indian Department to any sort of plan for the irrigation of that land.

Mr. MONDELL. Not by the Indian Bureau, possibly, but the matter has been investigated by the irrigation service, has it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. There has been no plan or investigation made relative to the land on this irrigation project. When I first came here the Delegate from Arizona, my predecessor, had a bill pending to open up these lands, and he could not get a report on it from the department. I introduced a similar bill, and on that I could not get a report from the department. Then I introduced another bill, and on that I could not get a report from the department; so I took up the matter with the Committee on Indian Affairs, and offered this amendment, which was adopted by the committee, to try to get the department to say what it would do.

There are 100,000 acres of the finest land on this continent in the Colorado River Indian reservation. It is lying idle, and no use is made of it. Other people, not only in the United States but in Mexico, are making appropriations of the waters of the Colorado. Unless something is done, the Indians will lose their rights to the use of this water. I wanted to get somewhere, and for that reason I offered this amendment. The committee was willing to allow a small appropriation in order to get a report from the Department of the Interior as to what should be done. I have not been able to get any information from the department whatsoever as to any plan for the irrigation of those lands.

Mr. MONDELL. I was under the impression that the Indian Bureau has made some investigation touching these particular lands. I know the Reclamation Service has made some investigation of the general situation. As a matter of fact, the Reclamation Service has for some years past been studying the general situation on the Colorado River.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was a favorite idea of the late director, Mr. Newell.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is a very wise idea. The State which I have the honor to represent here has been contributing for a couple of years past to a joint investigation of the situation on the Green, one of the large tributaries of the Colorado River, with a view to working out some plan for the utilization of the waters of the Green and the Grand, the two principal tributaries, and the main river.

I think the item a very excellent one. I hope there will be no objection to it. I was under the impression that the Indian Bureau had made an investigation, independent of the work that has been done by the Reclamation Service, in regard to the general question of the irrigation of the lands of the Colorado River Reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proviso beginning with line 19, on page 15, and ending with line 10, on page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the provisions of the sixth article of the treaty of June 1, 1868, between the United States and the Navajo Nation or Tribe of Indians, proclaimed August 12, 1868, whereby the United States agrees to provide school facilities for the children of the Navajo Tribe of Indians, $100,000: Provided, That the said Secretary may expend said funds, in his discretion, in establishing or enlarging day or industrial schools.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. How much is the current appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. HAYDEN. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is sure about that, of course?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; the last Indian appropriation act carried an item in the same language appropriating $100,000 for this purpose, and the continuing resolution carried on that appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Was it carried in the bill last year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is explained at page 168 of the hearings, about the middle of the page.

Mr. HAYDEN. It was carried in the bill last year.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About the middle of page 168 of the hearings it says:

The $100,000 appropriation for 1915 was used for increasing school facilities for Navajo children on the following reservations: Navajo, Western Navajo, Pueblo Bonito, and San Juan.

Mr. BORLAND. How many Navajo children are there?

Mr. HAYDEN. This is one of the largest tribes in Arizona. There are about 25,000 Navajos.

Mr. BORLAND. How many children are there among them?

Mr. HAYDEN. About 5,000. They are very poorly provided with schools.

Mr. MANN. How is this money expended?

Mr. BORLAND. How can they expend $100,000 a year?

Mr. HAYDEN. The money is expended for certain schools on the Navajo Reservation. In the last year the Indian Service spent money for the construction of a school building at the Chin Lee Boarding School, with a capacity for 200 pupils, $20,000; for repair of the old dining hall at the Fort Defiance Boarding School, $4,000; for an addition to the dormitory at the Western Navajo School, costing $25,000; for two dormitories at Toadlena, in the San Juan jurisdiction, costing $18,000, and so on.

Mr. MANN. This is used, then, as a method of getting money to construct buildings which would not be authorized otherwise? Do I understand the gentleman to mean that?

Mr. HAYDEN. The analysis of the expenditures, given on page 168 of the hearings, shows:

Traveling expenses	$33.65
Transportation of supplies	1,144.01
Printing, binding, and advertising	145.33
Subsistence supplies	22.26
Dry goods, clothing, etc	18.33
Equipment, material, etc	135.50
Construction	45,610.25
Repairs (to plant)	6,591.31
Total	53,700.64

Mr. MANN. Here is an item for education. The whole item being $100,000, $45,000 is spent for buildings and $10,000 or something like that for repairs. Is there any item in the expenditure at all which shows that any of it was used for educational purposes?

Mr. HAYDEN. This money is used to construct schools that the Indian Service is building on the Navajo Reservation. The Navajos had no schools or other educational facilities until this expenditure was begun by Congress in accordance with the treaty.

Mr. MANN. I understand it is to provide school buildings. That is legitimate; but is any of it used for education?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will read at the bottom of page 168 and the top of page 169, he will find it is there stated that there are between 25,000 and 30,000 Navajo Indians, and it is estimated that there are 5,000 Navajo Indian children without school facilities. The Government is under treaty to provide the Navajos with school facilities, and we have within the last three years begun to carry out that treaty provision, which has been on the statute books since 1868.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to find out whether a cent of the $100,000 that we appropriated was used for the purpose of education, and thereupon my distinguished friend from Texas reads a provision of the treaty stating that we are under obligation to do this. Do we do it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was giving the gentleman the analysis of the expenditure.

Mr. MANN. But not for educational purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that all of it is for educational purposes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, in one sense erecting a school building is making provision for education, but it is not for educational purposes. Do I understand that any of this money was paid for teachers to teach the children?

Mr. HAYDEN. I read from page 168 of the hearings:

The total expenditures of this appropriation plus the outstanding obligations amount to $99,034.97, leaving of the $100,000 an unused balance of $965.03. These expenditures have added a capacity of 260 pupils, making the present capacity of the Navajo schools 1,500 pupils in a country where it is estimated there are yet 5,000 children eligible for school for whom facilities have not yet been provided.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, if I understand, the gentleman from Illinois wishes to know whether any part of this $100,000 was used for salaries for teachers. I should say no; that it appears that the greater part of it was apportioned for the construction of new school buildings. The department apparently secured the money for paying the salaries and expenses of teachers out of some other fund.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that we already make an appropriation under the provisions and in accordance with the treaty for the education of these children; but the Indian Office comes in with this item and the committee reports it as though we were making an original appropriation for carrying out the treaty which we have been carrying out for years, regardless of this appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will turn to Document 121, Sixty-second Congress, page 2, he will find a complete statement of the whole matter. The whole amount expended is $164,569.80.

Mr. MANN. Is that paid out of this item?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. MANN. Then I can not see the pertinency of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But it gives the salaries and wages of the teachers that the gentleman was inquiring about.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order, although I have not secured the information.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the development of a water supply for the Navajo Indians on the Navajo Reservation, $25,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, reimbursable out of any funds of said Indians now or hereafter available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. Why is this made immediately available?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because it is in line with the request of the department in all irrigation items. They claim they ought to have it immediately available to take care of contingencies like a flood from the breaking of a dam and things of that kind. They need the money at once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much money has been appropriated for this purpose?

Mr. HAYDEN. The appropriation of the last Congress was $25,000, and they spent $23,500. They have an unexpended balance of $1,077 on hand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that the total balance?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WILLIAM M'KINLEY.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] at the McKinley memorial banquet in Pittsburgh on Wednesday last.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address by Dr. FESS at the McKinley memorial banquet in Pittsburgh. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 8235. An act to provide for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1916.

(Continuation of legislative day of Monday, January 31, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 381.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	Norris	Smoot
Bankhead	James	O'Gorman	Sterling
Beckham	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Stone
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Page	Swanson
Catron	Kenyon	Phelan	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Pittman	Thompson
Chilton	La Follette	Poindexter	Tillman
Clapp	Lane	Pomerene	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Vardaman
Cummins	Lewis	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lippitt	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	Lodge	Sheppard	Weeks
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Williams
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Works
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Hollis	Newlands	Smith, S. C.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. The Senator from Iowa has requested the yeas and nays upon his amendment. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my attention was diverted. What is the roll being called on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to say just a word before the vote is taken.

I intend to vote for this amendment, because I prefer it to the Clarke amendment. As an original proposition or as a proposition standing by itself I am not in favor of the amendment; and if it should be carried, I would feel impelled to vote against it upon the final vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry in order that I may vote intelligently. Does the Senator from Iowa offer his amendment as a substitute for the Clarke amendment or to the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a substitute for the Clarke amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a substitute for the Clarke amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is as I understood it when I made my remarks on yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word by way of explanation.

I shall vote for the Cummins amendment, not that I am in favor of the provisions of the amendment but because I think it is far better than the Clarke amendment. I should like to vote for the bill as originally reported without the preamble, and no amendment to it. I should like to vote against the preamble and all amendments to the bill, and if I have a chance to do so I shall so vote, but otherwise my vote will be cast against the bill, because I do not believe this is a proper time for the Government of the United States to discuss the question as to when the Filipinos shall receive their independence, as all admit they are not so prepared to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment without explanation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I shall not vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I do not see him in the Chamber and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote, as I understand that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted, and I am paired with him.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair as formerly announced to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Brandegee	Jones	Lodge	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Norris	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Oliver	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lane	Smoot	Weeks

NAYS—59.

Dillingham	Hughes	Sherman

So Mr. CUMMINS's substitute for the amendment of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas it is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

That not less than four years nor more than six years from the meeting of the legislature provided for in this act the President shall withdraw the sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands, except such small portions thereof as he may hereafter be authorized by Congress to hold and retain for naval bases, coaling stations, or other military or naval purposes. He shall, however, before completing the final steps of this withdrawal require of the Filipinos the establishment of a stable government, republican in form, and based upon the consent of the people duly ascertained at an election called by act of the legislature, approved by the President. At this election shall be submitted for approval the form of constitution recommended by the legislature as well as the names of all candidates for elective office in the first provisional government. If the constitution is approved and the provisional government created, the President shall then submit to it a formal treaty by which the United States shall recognize the independence of the Philippine Republic, and by which the latter shall undertake to fulfill all of the obligations of the United States in the Philippines incurred by the treaty of Paris or arising out of the occupation of the islands, including the personal and property rights of individuals and corporations of the United States and other countries, and the safeguarding of such Philippine government loans and obligations as have heretofore been authorized by act of Congress. Such treaty shall also contain for the benefit of the United States the most favored nation clause in trade relations.

Upon the exchange of ratifications of such a treaty the President shall turn over to the Philippine Government the control and sovereignty of the islands, except such naval bases and coaling stations as Congress may authorize. If, however, the President shall find at any time within the six-year period of limitation provided above that the condition of the external or internal affairs of the islands or the international relations of the United States require it, or if a satisfactory treaty can not be secured, he may by proclamation extend for the period of one year beyond the six years above provided the time for taking action under this act and thus afford to Congress an opportunity, in its discretion, to consider further the Philippine question, but any such extension of time by the President shall not otherwise suspend or nullify the operative force of this act unless Congress shall hereafter so direct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the chief differences between the substitute which I have proposed and the original amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] are as follows: First, the President is allowed a latitude of from two to six years, instead of a latitude of from two to four years; second, the period begins after the first meeting of the Philippine Legislature set up by this bill, in the case of my amendment, and it begins from the passage of the act in the case of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Next, my substitute provides that the government set up, which we are to recognize, shall be republican in form, such a government as Congress required the people of Cuba to set up. It is intended to guard against the danger that the Philippine people might be imposed upon by an autocratic form of government; that they might be carried away with the idea of providing a monarchy; something which I think would be abhorent to the minds of the American people after they have expended so many millions of dollars in attempting to enlighten and improve the condition of the Philippine Islands.

Next, my amendment provides that the government so set up shall be based upon the consent of the people and shall be established by peaceful means. It would never do for us to leave the Philippine Islands to the possibility that the government set up might be established by force and might be the result of a bloody revolution.

Next, my amendment provides that the rights of the people of other countries, already existing in the Philippine Islands under American protection, shall be protected and recognized by the new Philippine government. I think this is a very important matter. The Senator from Arksansas has provided for the protection of no rights except the rights of Americans in the Philippine Islands. It is true that there are six or seven thousand Americans in the islands, with a hundred million dollars of investments, and it is proper to protect their rights; but I believe that we shall almost certainly become involved in international difficulties similar to those that exist in Mexico if the new Philippine government should undertake to discriminate against the rights and property interests of the Germans, the English, the Japanese, the Chinese, the Danes, the Swedes, and all the other nationalities which exist in those islands at the present time. We can no longer protect those rights, it is true, but we should exact from the government which we are to set up and recognize a promise that they shall be observed the same as other rights.

Then, my amendment provides that the new government shall assume such obligations as the United States assumed in the treaty of Paris which the United States negotiated with Spain and by which it acquired sovereignty in the islands. That treaty guarantees the freedom of religion; it guarantees the rights of Spanish subjects in the courts; it guarantees the rights of Spanish people and their personal and business interests in the islands. When we surrender those islands to the new government which we set up, which can exist only by our grace, by our consent, it is certainly not too much to require that new government to assume the same obligations under which the Government of the United States rests at the present time; and that was one of the promises which we exacted from the Government of Cuba, and it is one which, I think, we should exact from any new government in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask not to be interrupted until I finish this category, and then I will submit to interruption.

My amendment provides for the safeguarding of the government debt and other obligations of the Philippine government which have been authorized by act of Congress. There has been issued, as I recall, $17,000,000, possibly $15,000,000, of government bonds. These bonds have been sold chiefly in the United States; they have been sold at a very low rate of interest and on very favorable terms, because they were authorized by act of Congress. In my opinion, whatever treaty is made with the new government should contain such clauses as will insure the validity and safety of these bonds. In the case of Cuba we prohibited Cuba from incurring any additional debt beyond an amount on which her revenues were sufficient to pay the interest, and I think some provision should be made for having these government bonds, which have been authorized by act of Congress, so safeguarded that their security will be absolute. It might be that the new government in the Philippine Islands might double or quadruple this debt, and if it did so it would greatly impair the obligation of these bonds which Congress has authorized.

Again, the Philippine government has incurred, by the authority of Congress, the guaranty of the interest on certain railroad bonds in the Philippine Islands. I think that that obligation, which was authorized by Congress and which is a moral obligation of the United States, should be safeguarded in whatever arrangement is made with the new government in the Philippine Islands, and I have provided for it in my substitute.

Then, Mr. President, I think, as a matter of justice to the business interests of the United States, there should be inserted in this agreement with the new Philippine government a promise that the United States trade shall always enjoy the benefits of the most-favored nations. That is certainly none too much to exact of the new Philippine government, and here and now is the place to specify it.

Another respect in which my substitute differs from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is with regard to naval bases. My amendment provides that only such naval bases and coaling stations shall be reserved and maintained as may be authorized by the Congress of the United States. That, I think, is a matter which should not be left to the discretion of the President, but should only be authorized by an act of Congress.

Another respect in which my substitute differs from the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is this: He provides that immediately upon the passage of the act the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations of the world, with a view to guaranteeing the independence of the Philippine Islands, and, failing to get any nation to agree with the United States to undertake that great burden, he places it for five years upon the United States; he obligates the United States to guarantee the independence of a nation which may be a monarchy, which may be an autocracy, which may be running into reckless governmental expenditures, and which may be threatened with revolution. Now, Mr. President, I think that that is a burden entirely too great for the United States to assume, and I have eliminated it altogether from the substitute which I have proposed to the Senator's amendment. It seems to me that an element of danger is involved in the provision which compels the United States for five years after the lapse of the next four years to guarantee practically the independence of this new government, nearly 8,000 miles from our shores. Such a guaranty will compel us to keep over there an army probably greater than that which we have now, and to maintain a naval force greater than we now provide for the purpose of holding the islands; and I have eliminated that feature from my substitute for that reason.

Mr. President, there are two other respects in which my substitute differs from the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. His amendment provides that the President may suspend the operation of this act in case the internal or external condition of affairs in the Philippine Islands requires it. He does not give the President permission to suspend the operation of this act in case the interests of the United States require it. It might happen that at the very psychological moment when the President was completing the act of retirement from the islands the United States would be involved in war or some other international complications might arise which would make it a dangerous and improper thing for us to retire from the islands, and yet the President would be required to go on with the act of vacating the islands. So I have provided that, in addition to the difficulties concerning internal or external affairs of the Philippine Islands, the President shall be permitted to submit the matter again to Congress, provided the interests of the United States at that moment seem to require it.

Mr. President, these are the chief differences between the substitute which I have offered and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. I will be glad now to submit to any questions that the Senator from Washington may desire to propound.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am not sure that I heard correctly the Senator's statement; but, as I understood him, he urged that his amendment be adopted because it provides that this Government in severing its relations with the Philippine Islands shall guarantee freedom of religion under the government which the Filipinos may set up in the islands, or shall make some agreement by which freedom of religion will be protected; also that we should make certain provisions for fulfilling the financial obligations which have been assumed there, such as the interest on railroad and certain other bonds. There are various other obligations which he urges shall be taken care of in the arrangement for severing the relations between this country and the Philippines. I should like to have the Senator explain his amendment in that respect, as to the means which the Government of the United States will employ to fulfill that great responsibility. After we have severed our relations with the Philippine Islands, as he proposes, how are we going to see that they pay their debts and that they do not impose religious persecution upon their people—upon the Mohammedan part of their population, for instance? As the matter stands now we are in control. Of course, we all stand for freedom of religion and for paying debts, both public and private. Now, we have the means to carry out those principles; but the Senator proposes to give up the control of the government of the islands, and then how are we going to accomplish the object which he says ought to be accomplished?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I have not undertaken to go into that. All I am asking the Senate to do is to incorporate in the act which proposes to give independence to the Philippine Islands a condition that the President, in negotiating the treaty of recognition, shall require the new Philippine government to make certain promises; to make the promise to observe the treaty obligations of the United States incurred in the treaty of Paris; to safeguard and maintain the integrity of the rights of Americans and other foreigners now existing in the Philippine Islands. I assume that if the new Philippine government be republican in form and established by peaceful means, and if that government enters into an agreement with the United States to perform these things it will carry that agreement into effect. Every nation in the world would be interested, as well as the United States, in seeing that agreement carried out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he does not believe that the Philippine people, through their representatives, would readily agree to all the guaranties which he proposes in order to obtain their independence? The probabilities are that they will so agree; but does the Senator think that that mere agreement, brought about by the hope and desire for national independence, will amount to very much?

What I am trying to ascertain as to the Senator's views is if he proposes that we shall follow up the agreement and see that it is carried out. Of course they will make the agreement, but it probably will not amount to very much. In the vicissitudes of government in the Philippine Islands after the restraining influence of the United States is withdrawn, suppose they break their agreement. Suppose they do not protect property and personal rights. Suppose they deprive the people of due process of law and of freedom of religion and repudiate their financial obligations. What are we going to do in that case?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that will not be for this Congress to determine. This Congress is confronted with the proposition whether or not it will require the new government to promise to carry out those just matters. It will be for another Congress to determine what action shall be taken in case those promises are violated. Certainly we can do nothing less than to require them to make the promises.

I differ from the Senator in this respect: I do not think those promises will be broken. I believe that if a government of the Philippine Islands is set up under the safeguards which are proposed it will substantially keep its promises. But even if I believed that they were to be broken I nevertheless would be in favor of requiring them to make the promises.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me we ought to be looking a little further than the mere securing of the agreement. In passing a great act involving the governmental status of several million people in the Philippine Islands and the interests of this country in relation to them we ought to have some policy as to the future. The Senator is responsible for his amendment. He is in charge of the bill. It seems to me a pertinent inquiry to know whether or not the Senator intends that this Government shall establish as a policy now, when we are passing this act, that we shall back up our agreement which we make at the time of severing these relations and that we shall enforce the treaty agreements which the Filipino people make with us.

If the Senator means to say by the answer which he has already given that he thinks we ought not to guarantee the performance of the treaty, that answers the question. That states his position. It seems to me, however, that we ought to know, we ought to have a definite idea, whether we are going to be responsible for our agreements or whether we are going to set these people adrift and pay no further attention to them.

If the Senator will permit me a moment further, I think making an agreement of that kind is simply sowing the seed for controversy, it is opening a Pandora's box of trouble, if we are going to live up to the obligations which manifestly will have been imposed upon us. Of course if we are going to wash our hands of it all, we will have no further trouble about it. If we are going to do nothing but exact a promise and pay no attention to the possible breaking of the promise, we will have no trouble, except the humiliation and the loss of self-respect and the respect of the other nations of the world for not performing our national obligations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska. Before making it I will state that I feel that the agitation inaugurated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] with reference to our withdrawal from these islands has been productive of excellent results in the amendment presented by the Senator from Nebraska, and it seems to me that some of the suggestions made by this amendment might well be incorporated in our legislation. I wish, however, to inquire of the Senator regarding the phrase "republican in form," on line 9 of the first page of this amendment It reads:

He shall, however, before completing the final steps of this withdrawal, require of the Filipinos the establishment of a stable government, republican in form, and based upon the consent of the people, duly ascertained at an election called by act of the legislature approved by the President.

It seems to me we might well require the establishment of a stable government; we might well require that that government should be based upon the consent of the people; but why should we require that it should be republican in form?

My view is that we are intruders in the Orient; that by taking possession of the Philippine Islands we became intruders in the Orient. We now wish to withdraw. It seems to me that those people have the right to establish such a government as they wish; and whilst I believe that they will choose a republican form of government, I question very much the propriety of our imposing it upon them by our law.

We are intruders in the Orient just as much as Japan would be an intruder were she to conquer the West Indies or Mexico; and if after such intrusion she should conclude to withdraw, I think we might well object to her imposition upon the people of the conquered territory as a condition of withdrawal that they should adopt a government monarchical in form.

There is no republican form of government in the Orient They have feebly attempted to establish a republic in China, and have failed. A Republic is the highest achievement of civilization, possible only with a people of the highest intelligence, poise, and self-control. The people of the Orient are not accustomed to a republican form of government. They hardly know what it is. The people of the Philippine Islands have not yet been democratized. They are still wedded to the old cacique system of head men, caciques, the patrons of those dependent upon them, who are ruled both governmentally and economically; and it will take a long time for them to evolve from that system.

I have no doubt that these people will make an experiment in a republican form of government, and I have not the slightest doubt that they will fail. I expect them, however, to attempt it, and it is probably the best thing for them to do. It is the only thing for them to do. I question, however, the propriety of our proposing a republican form of government as a conditinn of their independence.

Would the Senator object to the elimination of the words "republican in form"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suppose I should make some reply to the statement of the Senator from Nevada, if the Senator from Washington will permit me.

The reason for inserting the expression "republican form of government" was that we are responsible for whatever government is set up there. In view of the state of public sentiment in this country and also the argument presented by the enormous sum of money which we have expended there in endeavoring ourselves to establish a republican form of government, in view, also, of the fact that every one of the 48 States of the Union exists only because it maintains a republican form of government, and in view of the fact, also, that the only time that the Philippine people undertook to establish a government of their own they created or attempted to create a Republic, I think that the moral force of the United States can very properly be used here at the very outset to indicate the kind of government that the Philippine people shall establish.

There is no objection to it, no difficulty that will arise out of it, except the added force it will give to the good influences in the Philippines to prevent something like an autocratic or monarchical form of government being forced on the people, possibly by a revolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to say, furthermore, before I sit down, that "republican form of government" is not a phrase that necessarily indicates any particular form. The courts of the United States have on several occasions defined what a republican form of government was. They have indicated that that was a political expression and that there was a latitude for selecting the form of government, providing it was, in effect, the rule of the people; and the dictionaries defining "republican form of government" indicate that in its essence it is a government established by the people, with their consent, and maintained by their representatives.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question as to whether my interpretation of part of his amendment or substitute is correct. It reads:

If the constitution is approved and the provisional government created, the President shall then submit to it a formal treaty by which the United States shall recognize the independence of the Philippine republic.

The Senator has afterwards provided that—

Upon the exchange of ratifications of such a treaty the President shall turn over to the Philippine government the control and sovereignty of the islands.

What I desire to ask the Senator is whether my understanding is correct that the Philippine people can not get their independence unless that treaty is ratified by two-thirds of the Members of the Senate and whether the Senator thinks that under this bill one-third of this Senate could forever prevent the independence of the Philippine people?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think that one-third of the Senate would ever undertake to do anything which would break the faith of the United States, solemnly enacted into law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But is not the power vested there practically in the third to defeat Philippine independence under this amendment?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission I should like to ask him a question, in order to try to get his viewpoint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. REED. If we are going to leave the islands and retain anything whatsoever, would it not be necessary to secure our rights by treaty?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but not of necessity; and, as a matter of fact, not under the Clarke amendment——

Mr. REED. Let us leave the Clarke amendment out for the moment. Let me ask the question in another way. The Senator recognizes the fact that under the treaty of Paris this Government solemnly bound itself to the carrying out of certain conditions with Spain and with the Spanish people resident in the islands. The Senator recognizes that fact; does he not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. REED. Now, does the Senator think that we can turn over these islands and escape or repudiate that obligation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; the Clarke amendment provides for that.

Mr. REED. Very well. I am not talking about the Clarke amendment. I am asking a direct question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, this is a substitute for the Clarke amendment.

Mr. REED. I understand, but I should like to keep to the question. Now, if it be true that we have obligations to the Spanish Government which we can never escape or repudiate, and that those obligations include the protection of Spanish subjects and the property of Spanish people, is it not incumbent upon us, when we turn over the government of the Philippines, to secure from the Philippine government a treaty guaranteeing the carrying out of those conditions?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know that a treaty is necessary, but there should be a safeguarding; and we can retain that right just as it is done in the Clarke amendment, which will cause to be respected and safeguarded all the personal and property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States. The Senator from Arkansas has indicated that he is perfectly willing to put in "and of other countries," so that will make a perfect safeguard as to the rights of Americans and foreigners.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, then, sticking to my question, because we only want to get at what is right in this, does not the Senator recognize the fact that the only way in which we can secure these guaranties is by an agreement with the Philippine government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; we can reserve them in this act, just as has been done in the Clarke amendment.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator wants to get out and not get out?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No.

Mr. REED. If I understand the Senator, he is arguing now that he is opposed to this clause of the Hitchcock amendment because it might be that when the Senate is asked to confirm a treaty one-third of the Members may defeat the confirmation, and thus we will keep the islands for an indefinite period. Now, on the other hand, he argues for an amendment which implies that we shall reserve in our bill of independence such rights of supervision and such powers of control as will enable us to compel the Philippine government to carry out the terms of the treaty of Paris.

Now, I put this question to the Senator: Is not the proposition to retain control over the islands more detrimental to the liberties of the islands than the one contained in the Hitchcock amendment, which proposes to leave these people free to set up a government, and then to negotiate with that government, the Senate simply retaining the right to affirm or deny the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President, I do not think so. I do not think there would be any difficulty in the formation of a treaty with the Philippine people, if there should be a treaty required under the act, but my doubt is whether or not one-third of the Senate will defeat the treaty that might be agreed upon, in order to retain our present control and government of the Philippine Islands. The danger is on our part and not upon the part of the Filipinos, in my judgment.

Mr. REED. I understand that is the Senator's position, but somewhere and somehow there must be provided a protection against a repudiation of the obligation we entered into in the treaty of Paris. That protection can only be obtained in one of two ways. There may be an agreement upon the part of the Philippine Islands to carry out the terms and conditions of the treaty of Paris. That is one way. The other way is in the bill of liberation to stipulate that this Government reserves the right to compel the Philippine government to carry out the terms and conditions of the treaty of Paris.

Now, which one of the two is the more dangerous power to lodge with the Congress of the United States, for the Senator is manifestly afraid to trust Congress? Plainly any Senate that will be willing to break faith with the Philippine people after they have set up their government, any Senate that will be willing to repudiate a treaty solemnly entered into by the President in strict accordance with this bill of liberation, will find it an exceedingly easy thing to assert that we shall continue to exercise sovereignty over the islands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Why is not that true?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The position which the Senator takes does not in my judgment comport with the conditions that I believe exist there. The President unquestionably would have the right to prescribe a constitution and that constitution would contain a guaranty upon the part of the Philippine people to respect all the obligations which we assumed with relation to those islands in our treaty with Spain and also guarantee to the American people there and all foreigners the same rights as they have themselves. That is the agreement which they will make and under those conditions we will sail away. Consequently if they break the agreement it can be a subject of controversy between this country and theirs.

Now, this Clarke amendment provides that at the end of five and a half years at the most, unless something is done to extend the time, automatically their independence is established. It does not take an act of Congress. It does not require the ratification of a treaty. It provides that their independence shall be recognized at that time.

Now, to inject into this bill a provision that before independence is recognized there shall be a treaty negotiated between these two countries, which is to be referred to the Senate of the United States, when one-third of the Members thereof can defeat it and make the independence of the islands depend entirely upon that ratification is to practically place in the hands of one-third of the Members of this body the power to determine the status between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado if he does not think that if such a contingency should arise Congress could immediately take steps to secure what they have said in this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, possibly, but——

Mr. FLETCHER. There would then be time enough for such legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but we have been on this subject a good many years. We are likely to take five and one-half years more if we are going to pass the bill in a form where nothing will be settled, but if it is referred back to Congress as provided in the Hitchcock amendment, or where a treaty must be ratified before independence shall be given, it seems to me it puts us, at the end of six years and at the end of one year more, which would be seven years, in the same condition which exists right now. As to what may be the view upon independence in the Senate then I can not say, and it seems to me that no one else can. I want something more definite than that.

Mr. REED. The Senator certainly fails to see this question as I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think I do see it differently.

Mr. REED. The differences between us are not in matter of principle, but in failure on the part of the Senator to recognize certain things.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. I——

Mr. REED. First, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that when we propose to establish a government in the Philippine Islands we erect that territory and those people into a separate independent sovereign State, and we must then deal with them as a sovereignty. The very first thing the Senator most desires is to give them independence?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And yet the Senator proposes at the time he gives them an alleged independence to retain such control as will enable us for all time to compel them to carry out the terms of the treaty of Paris and to recognize certain property rights. In other words, he proposes to extend them not independence, not to confer upon them sovereignty, but to put them in a position of quasi dependence upon the United States.

The Hitchcock amendment is much more favorable to the Philippine Islanders. It gives them the right to set up a government stable in its form and republican in its essence. When they have done that it provides that they shall, as a sovereign power, make an agreement with us that they will carry out certain obligations we have hitherto assumed by the treaty of Paris.

The Senator agrees, I think, this far, that the Hitchcock amendment is a better proposition for the Philippine Islands than is the Clark amendment, provided the Senate of the United States does not arbitrarily refuse to confirm a treaty made in strict accordance with the law we are engaged in creating.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. He fears the Senate will not ratify a treaty with those people. Is it not better to take the stand that the Senate of the United States will not repudiate the obligations which this Government has assumed by the passage of this act, and will not repudiate a treaty entered into by the President in strict conformity with the provisions of the act. Can we not safely assume that the Senate will not abuse its power, so as to nullify a law solemnly passed and accepted by the Philippine government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like——

Mr. REED. Which of the two is the greater danger? Which of the two is most likely to keep chains upon the Filipino people and to hold out the temptation to sinister and evil interests to continue to control or to seek to gain control in those islands, the Clark amendment, which proposes to keep control, or the Hitchcock amendment, which must be carried out unless the Senate shall hereafter break faith by refusing to ratify a treaty made in consonance with a law we have enacted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will try to answer that question by saying to the Senator that I believe a provision contained in the constitution of the Philippine people that they will adopt, which guarantees all of the requirements which the Senator has specified, is the fairest way and the safest way. It ought not to be relegated to Congress or to this Senate for the purpose of ratification.

Mr. President, the difficulty with this very provision of the bill, requiring a treaty, does not recognize them as an independent nation at the time they are required to make the treaty. You make it a condition that a subordinate body under the United States authority shall make and present a treaty to the Senate of the United States. You have not given them their independence when you propose they shall make this treaty. You make independence contingent upon ratification, and you have the anomaly of having a coordinate branch of our own Government presenting to the United States Senate a treaty for ratification when the Philippines have not their independence at all, but are under the jurisdiction, powers, and control of the United States.

That is an anomaly which no one, it seems to me, who carefully examines the matter could ask anyone to approve. The legislature and the constitutional convention which they are to have are not to be independent until they are recognized as independent, and you are asking that a subordinate body of the United States, holding power and position with the Government of the United States, shall have jurisdiction and control to present to the Senate of the United State a treaty, as if it were an independent nation. It is not an independent nation. Consequently that anomaly makes it inconsistent and impracticable. Treaties are made between independent Governments.

Now, it seems to me that the safe way is that which has been indicated. I admit there are some amendments which ought to be made to the Clarke amendment, and the proper way to obtain them is to make each particular provision apply not as a substitute, but as an amendment to the Clarke amendment. If you want to put in the word "may" instead of "shall" with relation to the coaling stations and naval bases, all right and good. The Senator from Arkansas is willing to make that amendment. Various other suggestions which were made by the Senator from Nebraska were acceptable to the Senator from Arkansas.

It seems to me we will get a much better provision and a much better bill if we take the Clarke amendment and amend it, and let the vote be upon each of the accepted portions of it, and then let what is left of the Clarke amendment be substituted for the preamble of the bill.

Mr. REED. Therefore the Senator makes the argument that we do not propose to make a treaty with a free people, that we propose to have this people set up a government under our supervision and then make a treaty with that people, when it is not really free to act.

But the Senator says at the same time that these people can guarantee the carrying out of the same duties through a constitution, a constitution that is also to be adopted while we are still in the islands, a constitution that is to be adopted while our power is still there.

The argument of the Senator carries him too far. If the people are not free to make a treaty, neither are they free to adopt the constitution. Applying the reasoning in one case to the other, the Senator has argued himself into the position that the Filipinos can not do anything to bind themselves in any way until and unless we first march away from the islands and leave them free to have their election in their own way and adopt such a constitution as they see fit, and that not until then can they do anything to bind themselves.

The trouble with the Senator's argument is that it strikes down an agreement by constitutional enactment as effectually as it does an agreement by treaty.

There is another trouble with it——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now——

Mr. REED. It is that the Senator's whole argument proceeds upon the theory that the United States proposes to do something to interfere with free action on the part of the Philippine people instead of following the fact which is that we propose to leave them absolutely free to hold a fair and free election. We propose to leave them free to set up a government. We place no other restrictions save that it shall be republican in its form and stable in its character.

Now, we propose before we go out to have some kind of agreement with that people that they will respect the treaty of Paris and respect certain property rights. How are we to get that agreement? The Senator says let them write it in a constitution that is written under our supervision while we are still in the islands and that that is a sufficient guaranty to us.

I reply, first, that the constitution will be made under the same conditions as the treaty will be made, viz, while we are still in the islands. If the argument that a treaty made while we are still in the islands is invalid, then, of course, a pledge made in a constitution adopted while we are in the islands is equally invalid.

I reply, second, that no one ever heard of a nation making a contract with another nation having obligations to perform by which the first nation assumed to carry out the obligations of the second nation in any other way than by a treaty.

What is a constitution? It is an agreement by the people of a nation among themselves. It is simply their declaration of a public policy. They have the right to change it at any moment they see fit. If they are a sovereign power, they have the right to change it as they see fit. We have no right to complain. It is not a contract in any sense of the term with this Government.

The only way we can make a contract with the people of the Philippine Islands and have an obligation running from them to us which we have the right to enforce is by a treaty, for a treaty is simply a contract between two governments, and if we are not to make a treaty, if we are to have no contract, then we can have no guaranty, unless, indeed, it be the guaranty of power, the guaranty of force, the guaranty of a retention of partial sovereignty, or suzerainty over the islands. The beautiful dream the Senator holds out to the Philippine people to-day appears to be that we will retain sovereignty and control and we will enforce, by fire and sword, our mandates upon them. On the other hand, the Hitchcock amendment proposes that we shall erect them into a stable and free government and take the obligations of that government that it will carry out certain promises.

Mr. SHAFORTH. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will say that the Filipino people seem to be satisfied with the Clarke amendment. They have sent to the Senate and to the Congress of the United States a specific indorsement of it. If tyranny is to be exercised over them under that amendment, you can readily see——

Mr. REED. How did the Philippine people do that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Their legislature unanimously voted it not six days ago.

Mr. REED. The legislature, I apprehend, has not read the Clarke amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been cabled over there, I have no doubt.

Mr. President, when the Philippine people place in their constitution the provision which will be required under the terms of this act, that the rights of Americans and the rights of foreigners shall be protected, I have not the slightest doubt there will never be a deviation from it. The Filipino people are honest; they pay their debts. They are as anxious to establish the credit of their government as we are to retain the credit of ours. Consequently, when this provision is made, I have no doubt that it will be carried out to the fullest extent; but when you again refer the question of independence to the Senate alone and make the independence of the Philippines dependent upon a treaty to be ratified by this Senate, one-third of the Members thereof can entirely defeat such independence. In my judgment, there is more danger of that than there is that the Philippine people will not carry out the obligations which they will express in their constitution.

Mr. REED. That is to say, the Senator from Colorado has more confidence in the honesty of the Filipino people than he has in one-third of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; that is not the question. We know right now that there are in this Chamber many Senators who do not believe in giving up our sovereignty over the Filipinos at all. They are perfectly honest in that view; they believe it is to the interests of the Filipinos and that it is also to the interests of the American people. I have no criticism of their honesty, but as to the question of a governmental policy we differ. I have no doubt that there would be no difference whatever with respect to the Filipinos carrying out their obligations to the United States; you would not find a single man there but would say he would do it; it is not a policy upon which there is any dispute. For that reason it seems to me that our legislation ought to be as it is expressed in the Clarke amendment.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado can not escape by that kind of logic. He asserts, first, that the Philippine people are all honest.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. No; I have the floor, and I will yield in a moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me, I was not asking the Senator to yield.

Mr. REED. I thought not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] had taken his seat when I addressed the Chair, and neither the Senator from Missouri nor the Senator from Colorado had a right to the floor.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to finish this colloquy? Then, I will quit the floor.

The Senator from Colorado makes the broad assertion that all the Philippine people are honest; that they all pay their debts; that their government is going to be entirely honest. Well, I hope all that is true; but, if it is true, they are the most remarkable people on earth. The Senator from Colorado couples that assertion with the statement that one-third of the Members of this Senate will do what? Will refuse to ratify any treaty that may be made, although that treaty may be in strict conformity with the obligations of this act; although we shall pass this act to-day, and in pursuance thereof the Philippine people shall call an election; that relying upon our pledge they will set up a government, write a constitution, establish themselves in the form we have prescribed; and that, having complied in all respects with their part of the contract, one-third of the Members of the United States Senate will dishonestly, corruptly, and infamously break the faith of this Government. I do not think the people of the Philippines are so good as the Senator thinks and I do not think that one-third of the Senate will be quite so bad as the Senator anticipates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me, from a hasty reading of this proposed amendment, that it contains some elements of confusion that are likely to lend to mischievous results.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], if he is present, to the language of the amendment. In the first place, the provision is—

> That not less than four years nor more than six years from the meeting of the legislature provided for in this act the President shall withdraw the sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands—

And so on. We have there a provision absolute in its terms, that within six years in any event, no matter what else happens, the sovereignty of the United States shall be withdrawn; but, before completing the final steps of withdrawal, the amendment requires certain things of the Filipino people, which it is not now necessary to read.

Before reading the second clause of the amendment I may say that one of the things which the President is required to bring about is the submission of a formal treaty, which shall contain certain things as to the government of the Philippine Islands. Then the provision is:

> Upon the exchange of ratifications of such a treaty the President shall turn over to the Philippine government the control and sovereignty of the islands, except such naval bases—

And so on. The effect of that is that the sovereignty of the islands shall not be turned over to the people until there has been an exchange of ratifications of this proposed treaty. Suppose that near the time of the expiration of the six years specified in the first part of this amendment the President shall have succeeded in laying before the Philippine provisional government a treaty, and that that treaty has been returned and is pending before the Senate of the United States, we will assume that the Senate of the United States would be honest, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] says it would be, but the Senate takes time to investigate the treaty; it has to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations; it is investigated there; in the meantime the six years expire, the treaty may be pending here for five or six months. I should like somebody to explain to me what in the meantime becomes of the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands. At the end of the six years, not dependent upon the ratification of the treaty, but only dependent upon the fact that the treaty has been submitted to the Philippine people, our sovereignty is to be withdrawn, but it is not to be turned over to the Philippine government until this treaty has been ratified. What has happened to it? Is it hanging in the air somewhere? There is no sovereignty anywhere. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] suggests, has the President got it, or is it hanging somewhere like Mohammed's coffin?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, for six weeks—practically for the whole of this session—the Philippine bill has been under discussion in the Senate, with the result, as it seems to me, that confusion is now worse confounded. There are some facts, however, which have been established during the discussion to which I propose to call attention for a moment.

In the first place, it is practically conceded that the Filipinos are not capable of self-government at this time; nor has anybody presented a serious proposition to the effect that they be given their independence now. Every proposition has assumed that it will require more time in order to fit them for governing themselves. This is the opinion of every man qualified by knowledge and experience to speak on the subject. There must be some reason for this bill.

The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, opened the case to the Senate with a statement that it was to be devoid of politics; that he hoped it would be discussed on the high plane of nonpartisanship; and yet almost every speaker who has contended for the measure and its amendments has maintained that it was in conformity with the Democratic national platform, and that therefore the Democrats, at least, were compelled to support a proposition which promised independence to the Filipinos. Some have been content with indefinite promises; others have been definite.

There is another fact which stands out clearly and undisputed, and that is that thus far the work of the United States in the Philippines has been most satisfactory. That is admitted by all who have addressed the Senate. That great progress has been made, therefore, I assume to be true; that we are doing a great work, such as has never been undertaken before by any country, is admitted; and yet, at this time, the proposition of changing the policy which has resulted in honor to the United States and good to the Filipinos is being seriously urged and amendment after amendment is proposed to which there are serious objections. Most of these amendments are offered either without full knowledge of conditions or regardless of their effect.

It looks to me as though there is a disposition on the part of some Senators to scuttle the ship—to haul down the Stars and Stripes from over the Philippine Islands. That has been tried once or twice on another occasion with disastrous effect to the party which was responsible for so doing. I am not insisting that our flag shall always float over the Philippines, but I do insist that it shall be lowered in honor and not in cowardice. If we haul down the flag, it must be because we propose to better the condition of the Filipinos, for another fact is admitted, namely, that we are in the Philippine Islands to-day for the good of the Filipinos. Those people themselves admit that we have done them good and are doing them good to-day. It is also admitted, or practically admitted, that the Philippine Islands are not capable of governing themselves if we leave them to their own destiny, to their own devices at the present time; and, therefore, it is proposed by some that we shall in some way release our power but retain our responsibility for the government of the islands. I emphatically object to that, Mr. President.

I favor the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in one respect over the Clarke amendment, and that is the provision that when the time for independence does come, the United States shall relieve itself of all responsibility. I want to do that; and I am glad that there are Senators who agree with me that it is not wise for our country to form an entangling alliance with other nations, an alliance which, under the so-called Clarke amendment, might force the United States to become the ally of nations with which we might not wish to be allied and against nations that we would not like to oppose. In any event, there are infinite possibilities of trouble which may come to us if we seek to have a binding arrangement between the United States and other nations to maintain the independence of the Philippine Islands. We should keep control of the Philippines until our work is complete, and then when that time comes, it will be wise to talk of independence. It is not wise to do so before.

Mr. President, I do not believe that at this time we should meddle with this question, except possibly to extend the power of government a little further to the Filipinos, as the bill proposes, but let us not release our power and still retain responsibility to these people and to the world for conditions in the Philippines.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has said that the people of the Philippines are favorable to the Clarke amendment. Why, sir, I believe that the intelligent Filipinos would be panic stricken if they knew that the United States was to withdraw its protection and its defense of those islands at the present time, or even within six years. If they knew what this amendment means, they would oppose it.

Senators seek to attach a condition, whereby this question may be relegated again to the Senate or to Congress at some future time, thus evidently hoping to evade responsibility and turn the problem over to the next administration and thus comply with a Democratic platform promise. To me this means confusion. It does not settle anything, but instead it complicates the problem.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I think that in some respects the Hitchcock amendment is preferable to the one introduced by the Senator from Arkansas, as it avoids some dangers which are involved in the latter, yet by voting for it I might possibly be the means of carrying it and writing it into the law, and I do not wish to do anything with the Philippine Islands along the lines suggested by any of these amendments. By voting against it, I might enable the Clarke amendment to carry, which, in my judgment, is still worse. Therefore, being confused, and yet knowing, or feeling that I know, that we are engaged in a dangerous business now, that we are playing with fire that may grow into a conflagration before it is quenched, I feel that it is my duty to vote against every proposition which has been thus far submitted.

If some arrangement could be made whereby the preamble could be stricken from the bill, I should be very glad to vote for the measure as presented by the committee, and thus give a little more power to the Filipinos in order to test their ability for self-government; but, inasmuch as this can not be made and believing as I do believe, that they are not fitted for self-government, that they will not be fitted for self-government in that time, and that probably the experience which shall come out of the next six years will compel the Congress to annul what is being done now, I feel that it is my duty to vote against all of these propositions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] offered as a substitute for the amendment presented by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is not now present, asked me to see that the vote was not taken upon the matter until he might have an opportunity to be heard. I desire to make a few observations in any event with respect to the matter, and pending his return I will do so.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of contention on the part of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and other Senators in regard to the guaranty clause of five years, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to a few facts with relation to it. We ought to take some little time to insure that the people we propose to make an independent nation shall have an opportunity to start their government properly, and that they shall have protection. We assume no more responsibility in that five years than we are assuming now; and if, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], we should stay there a great many years, or a considerable number of years more, no greater obligation would be assumed than the obligation we now have.

It is said that there is objection by reason of the fact that we will not have any authority in the islands, but we will be responsible for the condition of those islands, and that that is radically wrong. Why, Mr. President, we have not found it so. For 93 years we have been guaranteeing the independence of 20 nations on this continent, and yet we have never had any war by reason of that fact. It has not been a matter that has made other nations attempt conquest.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There has been very frequent comparison made of the guaranteeing of the independence of the Philippine Islands with the obligations which we have assumed under the Monroe doctrine, and also with the relation we bear to Cuba. It seems to me the Senator recognizes the departure involved in going to Asia to establish such a policy of protection to weaker people as we have assumed with regard to the Americas. The Senator has instituted that comparison again; and I only rose to remark that it emphasizes and illustrates what seems to me to be the colossal mistake of the whole proposition of going across the Pacific Ocean to carry a new Monroe doctrine into that hemisphere.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The difference between the Senator and myself is that we differ fundamentally upon this question. I respect his opinion; he is entitled to it; and he is just as honest as I am; but we look at the matter from different standpoints. We have that protectorate over there now. The question is whether we shall give these people, who establish a new government five years' time in which to fix their relations with the other nations of the world.

I have no doubt that no nation would interfere during the five years. Any nation that intended to jump on to the Philippine Islands would not do so until the five years expired. There is no danger. The very fact that we limit it shows that we do not want a Monroe doctrine over there. It was the acquisition of those islands, in the first place, that violated the Monroe doctrine upon this side of the water; because, if we compel other nations to keep their hands off of our territory or territory in the Western Hemisphere, the eastern people or other people have a right to protest against our taking or seizing anything in the Orient.

Here is a provision for five years. The very fact that we limit it to five years shows that we do not want the Monroe doctrine to exist over there. For that reason, it seems to me, it is a proper provision, in order to let them have a government there with a start to it, and that it would be a good thing to let other nations negotiate with them and form treaties in that period of five years.

As I said before, we have guaranteed the independence of 20 nations for the last 93 years, and we never have had a war about it. Why should people think that in this limited period of five years we would get into trouble, so that there would be people watching for the five years to begin, and then they would get into complications with the United States?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he is not putting it a little strongly when he says that we have guaranteed the independence of 20 nations?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, we have indicated to all of Europe, and to the most powerful nations then in the world—far more powerful than we were—that it would be an unfriendly act upon their part if they attempted to colonize upon any of the Republics of the South or Central American States.

Mr. STERLING. Is not that altogether a different proposition from guaranteeing their independence?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, that is a practical guaranty of their independence, because the only attack that could be made upon it would be by some powerful nation; and when you warn that powerful nation that you mean war if they attempt to do it, they will not attempt to do it. They have not done so heretofore. Here are 20 nations that have been kept independent, in many instances, I have not any doubt, by reason of that very fact. We simply want to make an arrangement here for five years and then terminate it, showing that we do not want the Monroe doctrine to extend to the Eastern Hemisphere. It seems to me that there ought to be no serious objection to it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, on the pending question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question about his amendment.

The Senator provides in his substitute for an election to be held by the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands to pass upon the constitution and plan of government which may be submitted to them. Under what auspices would the Senator have that election held?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is to be held under the auspices of the existing government in the Philippine Islands, which, after the passage of this bill, will be a legislature, both branches of which have been elected by the Philippine people.

Mr. STONE. Then, the election would be held wholly under the supervision of the Philippine government or of its officers?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. STONE. My reason for asking the question is that in conditions as I think they are in the Philippines the result of an election might be determined one way or another by manipulation and might not, in fact, reflect the sentiment of the voters; and I wondered if, before we separated from them, in the plan of government that is submitted there should not be some supervision over the election by some American authority—by impartial men?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I see what the Senator means, but I think it is fairly well safeguarded. In the first place, the legislature as it exists at the present time consists of an upper and a lower house, the upper house being appointed by the President and the lower house elected by the people. After this act goes into effect, however, an election will be held for both the upper and the lower house—24 senators in the upper house and 90 representatives in the lower house. That legislature will then pass an act calling for an election to pass upon the constitution and elect a provisional government. That act, however, must receive the approval of the President of the United States before it goes into effect, which would require the Philippine Legislature to consult the views of the President of the United States. After that act has been passed, then the election would be held like any other election in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. STONE. That is all I care to ask or say in respect to that matter.

Mr. President, the last clause of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska does not meet my approval. Beginning in the twenty-third line of the second page, I read:

> If, however, the President shall find, at any time within the six-year period of limitation provided above, that the condition of the external or internal affairs of the islands or the international relations of the United States require it, or if a satisfactory treaty can not be secured, he may by proclamation extend for the period of one year beyond the six years above provided—

And so forth.

That would put the whole matter in the hands of the President, to send it back to Congress if he thought proper to do so. If, in his opinion, the internal or external affairs of the islands did not augur well for the future of the islands, he might throw the whole work of Congress in this particular overboard and send the matter back to Congress, and thus the whole question would be opened again. I confess it is difficult for me, at least, to frame in my own mind a plan along this line that is satisfactory; and I find that the substance of what I have read from the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

I should like to strike that out of this amendment, from where I began reading to the end of the amendment. In place of it I should like to insert something like this, which I will read. That is to say, beginning after the words "may authorize," in the twenty-third line, leaving the amendment intact down to that point, I should like to insert something like this:

Provided, That prior to the exchange of ratifications of such a treaty, and before the President shall turn over to the Philippine government the control and sovereignty of the islands, the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations especially interested in the affairs of that part of the world to enter into a treaty or convention, jointly or severally, with the United States, obligating or pledging themselves—

From there on it differs from the suggestion contained in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, which provides for a treaty with these outside nations to guarantee the sovereignty of the islands. I would have it this way, if I could:

Obligating or pledging themselves—

That is, the outside nations—to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippine Islands and the government thereof.

I think I will leave it there. I prefer this form of expression, in a bill providing for a treaty or treaties to be made between this Government and other Governments, to the one in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas for two reasons:

First, it does not seem at all likely or probable that outside Governments would make treaties of that kind with the United States, absolutely guaranteeing the sovereignty and independence of the Philippines against outside attack. I am not going to enlarge upon that, it has been dwelt on here so frequently by other Senators; but I am impressed with that view.

The second reason is that if we alone are to guarantee the independence of these people, as is provided in the so-called Clarke amendment, I am impressed by the objections that have been made as to that provision. I approve of that part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, which provides for the holding of an election for the formation of a constitution and plan of government to be submitted to the people; but after that I would give them independence absolutely—right off the bat—with only one reservation or condition, and that is that the principal nations—and who are the principal nations would be left to the judgment of the President—shall merely pledge themselves in a solemn convention with the United States that they, each for itself, will promise not for a given space of years—although that might be put in—not to assault the integrity of that sovereignty. We propose to give them their independence as a free offering; and the other nations of the world could very well afford to contract with the United States that they would keep their hands off of the islands, and always accord to them the independence which we have conferred upon them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there is on this side of the Chamber a good deal of objection to such a condition in this legislation, for fear that it might not be possible to secure from the other nations such an agreement; and if it could not be secured, then the whole legislation would fall to the ground. I have omitted all reference to an international agreement. I have omitted all reference to a guaranty by the United States of the independence of the Philippines, partly because it seems to me that that is a matter for future Congresses to decide upon. Personally I should not be in favor of guaranteeing their independence for any length of time. I think it is too large a burden for the United States to undertake.

As far as the suggestion of the Senator is concerned that the President should be authorized and requested to undertake negotiations with other countries for a mutual or reciprocal recognition of their independence, I should be in favor of that; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that need not be put in the present bill. In any event, it could not take place inside of two years under the terms of either of the amendments now before the Senate, and I believe for that reason it would be better not to undertake to incorporate it in the amendment.

Mr. STONE. I do not offer what I have read as an amendment, but as a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska, who offered the substitute. What I have said will serve at least one purpose, as far as I am personally concerned; it will again put on record my attitude with respect to this question. But I do not offer an amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska covering the phraseology of his amendment on page 2, lines 6 to 11. The phraseology is this:

If the constitution is approved and the provisional government created, the President shall then submit to it a formal treaty by which the United States shall recognize the independence of the Philippine republic, and by which the latter shall undertake to fulfill all of the obligations of the United States in the Philippines incurred by the treaty of Paris or arising out of the occupation of the islands—

And so forth.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] objects to that phrase upon the ground that inasmuch as a treaty would require the consent of two-thirds of the Senate it would be in the power of one-third of the Senate to absolutely defeat hereafter the independence of the islands by refusing to ratify such a treaty. I suggest to the Senator that that might be obviated by the insertion, in the place of the sentence referred to in lines 6 to 11, of the following words:

Such constitution shall provide that the Philippine republic will fulfill all the obligations of the United States in the Philippines—

And so forth.

The Senator will observe that under this provision it would be necessary for the Philippine people to incorporate in their constitution the obligation not only to fulfill all the provisions of the treaty of Paris, but also to guarantee all personal and property rights of individuals and corporations of the United States and other countries and safeguarding such loans and obligations as have heretofore been authorized by the act of Congress.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada, I will say that I considered that plan in drafting this substitute. There are, however, some objections to it.

In the first place, a constitution is a document which can be changed by the people who adopt it. It seemed to me that we should have a contract between the United States and the Philippine government to cover these questions.

In the next place, it seemed to me that it was almost unthinkable that the Senate of the United States, after Congress had finally settled this question, would be guilty of bad faith in refusing to carry out a treaty which had been entered into.

I considered, first, the possibility of an agreement to which the Senate should not be a party, but inasmuch as it was intended to be for all time and was intended that this should be an independent government, it seemed to me the proper way was to have the rights that are now guaranteed by the United States, for which the United States is responsible, enacted into a treaty which the United States would have its proper method of enforcing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator whether he recalls in what manner the stipulation between the United States and Cuba was made that the United States should have the right to intervene in case of domestic disorder, with a view to preserving a republican form of government?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In that case the United States practically dictated certain features of the Cuban constitution, but there the situation was entirely different. There was then no government in the island of Cuba, but there is a government in the Philippines. It seems that the situation is somewhat different. Cuba is right at our door. We are carrying on a protectorate over Cuba at the present time. I think the sentiment in the United States is in favor of separating the Philippines from us absolutely and giving her recognition as an independent country, without the exercise of any of the rights of a protectorate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the Senator believe that a stipulation of this kind embraced in the constitution adopted by the Filipino people would be as binding upon them as a treaty with us?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that the rights of the United States are quite definite and clear under a treaty, a treaty particularly which would have the moral support of all the other nations of the world, because it would be in part for the protection of their legitimate interests in the islands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he has considered the question as to the economic condition of the Philippine Islands at the time the separation takes place, and whether he has adequately guarded against such conditions as would be sure to result in disorder.

I will call his attention particularly to the tariff relations with this country. At present the Filipino people have favored tariff relations with us and we have favored relations with them. Under our legislation we have a reciprocal tariff with the Philippines under which the currents of trade were very seriously changed. The commerce of other countries with the islands was displaced and our commerce substituted, and the current of trade thus established between the Philippine Islands and the United States became the main current.

I presume that when we free them we propose not only to give them intellectual independence but economic independence. The effect of the tariff system which we have inaugurated in the Philippine Islands has been to put them partially upon a protective basis; that is to say, they get to-day in our markets 1 cent a pound, $20 a ton, more for their sugar than they can get anywhere else in the world, and they also get an increased price for their tobacco and other products. Just as soon as we sever the governmental ties that connect us and also sever that economic tie, as I presume it will be severed, the Senator must realize that there will be a drop in the price which they will receive for these products, and that drop in the price may involve very serious economic distress in the islands.

We know the price of sugar has had a great effect upon the revolutions of Cuba. The troubles in Cuba out of which governmental complications arose were largely, in the first instance, economic, arising from the distress of its people. Now, is it proposed that we shall end these favored tariff relations or that we shall continue them, and if we continue them will the oriental countries adjoining look with favor upon a system that gives us the advantage in trade with the Philippine Islands? Can we very consistently urge the open door in the Orient, particularly in China and Korea, equal opportunity to all the commercial nations of the world when we have already closed the door of the Philippines against other nations, and when, if we continue those relations after the governmental tie is severed, we will still be closing the door of the Philippines to the equal opportunity of other nations? It seems to me that all these economic questions ought to be carefully looked into and investigated before we cut the tie that binds.

Now, there is another thing, and that is with reference to a common language. The Philippine Islands have to-day about five or six hundred thousand children at school, whilst there are 2,000,000 children of school age. They expend about $2,000,000 annually, or about $4 apiece per annum upon those children in educating them.

In the United States, with a population of 100,000,000 people, we spend $523,000,000, I believe, in popular education, about $5 for every head of population and nearly $30 for every child, there being about 20,000,000 children at school. Thirty dollars, then, is spent in this country for every child as against $4 in the Philippine Islands. So I imagine the education can not be very extensive, even as to the 500,000 children who are now in school, and the other 1,500,000 children are not receiving training at all.

We must all admit if we intend to start these people upon self-government, it is essential that they should have a common language. You can, under an imperial or monarchical government such as prevails in Russia, gather together people differing in races and in language and control them; but where you have the highest form of government established, that form of government which can only be successfully conducted by people of intelligence and balance and self-control and information, it seems to me you must require a common language, so that the people can communicate their ideas and their information to each other.

Of course, we claim to be governed by altruistic motives with reference to the Philippines. I think that is true to-day. It was not true when we acquired them. The commercial instinct, the instinct of conquest, controlled us when we acquired them, and we have become very altruistic of late largely because we find the islands do not pay.

However this may be as to the past, if to-day we are bent upon altruism, upon philanthropy, why not do a good job? After having spent $600,000,000 in a war in which the Philippine Islands were conquered, and subjected ourselves to an expense of nearly $500,000,000 more in the increased military expense necessitated by the holding of those islands, why should we hesitate in spending a few millions more in fitting the Filipino people for self-government, in giving them not only the intellectual training but the industrial training that will be necessary in order to establish a well-ordered government?

Why should we not in this bill provide that during this period of six years of trial and gradual approach toward independence a sum of at least $20,000,000 should be appropriated with a view to extending the education of the Filipino people, so that at the end of six years a very much larger number will be trained in a common language? Why should we not appropriate a part of the money, or perhaps an additional sum, to industrial training, for the essential thing with the Filipinos is to teach them how to work. In that climate no one wants to work. All the white men there avoid it, if they possibly can.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. I think the Senator is quite right in saying that in that climate very few people want to work. It has been noticed that the honey bee, which is the most industrious of all insects, when transferred to that country will stop laying up honey the second year. After that no more honey comes from that bee; he goes on a strike.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no doubt that is the case. It is the case with most people who live in our climate and go there and remain long. I know every American there wants to avoid exposure in the sun if he can.

But, Mr. President, we have not as yet trained those people industrially. One method of training them would have been to create an agricultural bank, in order to give the small farmers an opportunity of borrowing money at a reasonable rate of interest, with a view to the development of their farms.

When I was there some 9 or 10 years ago they were plowing with forked sticks and they had the most primitive methods of cultivating and grinding sugar. The complaint then was that it was utterly impossible for the small farmers to borrow money for the purpose of getting the implements of agriculture. Then the question of an agricultural bank was being urged, and I appeared before the Senate Committee on the Philippines some eight years ago and urged that a Government agricultural bank be established there with a capital of $10,000,000 provided by the United States Government. We did provide for an agricultural bank, but capital was to be furnished by the insular government. I believe that the insular government was only able to set aside for that purpose about half a million dollars, a sum totally inadequate to meet the exigencies of the situation.

If we are going to do a good job in philanthropy and in altruism, why should we not now provide for an agricultural bank there, with a capital of at least $10,000,000, and give that bank the opportunity to establish a vivifying influence in agriculture during the next six years of our stay?

I fear, Mr. President, the experiment of a republican form of government in the Philippine Islands. I fear it will fail not because the hand of power is applied from the outside but because the Filipino people will be unable to conduct a republican form of government. I fear that changes in officials will take place, as they do in all poorly organized peoples, through revolutions instead of through elections. That is the only way they have in many of Central American and South American Republics of determining upon a change of officials. The elections are farces. They seem incapable of providing machinery under which an honest expression of popular opinion can be secured. I see no reason to believe that the Filipino people will be any wiser or more capable in this direction than the people of the Central American and many of the South American Republics.

I am for withdrawing from the Philippine Islands, because I think we ought never to have gone there. I can reconcile myself with leaving those islands now, notwithstanding the responsibilities which we assumed, because I feel that they are better off to-day because of our stay there than they would have been without our stay there.

I am unwilling to assume any obligations for the future regarding those islands. I believe that when we cut the tie that binds those islands to us and they sail off into individualized life that should be the end of our responsibility. I believe that any obligation to maintain the independence of those islands after they are severed from us will involve us in immeasurable difficulties.

I am willing to go to great expense in discharging fully the obligations which we have assumed by reason of our possession there to train those people in a common language and train them in habits of industry and to secure them the opportunity at all events of maintaining a popular form of government. Having expended over a billion dollars, I would not regard it as an act of extravagance during this period of six years now intervening before our final parting to expend a considerable sum of money, as high as $50,000,000, in really training those people for independence and self-government by securing them a common language and training them in habits of industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas demanded the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McCumber	Shields
Beckham	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Borah	Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hardwick	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.
Catron	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Husting	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Chilton	James	Overman	Smoot
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sterling
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Phelan	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Pittman	Sutherland
Colt	Kern	Poindexter	Thompson
Cummins	La Follette	Pomerene	Tillman
Curtis	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Wadsworth
du Pont	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Warren
Fall	Lewis	Saulsbury	Weeks
Fletcher	Lippitt	Shafroth	Williams
Gallinger	Lodge	Sheppard

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendment to the amendment I should like to say that I fear that under the Hitchcock amendment the Philippine people will not secure their independence within any time known to the mind of man; that they may be held perpetually under subjection by this Government; that it is required that they shall fulfill certain obligations which it can easily be rendered impossible for them to fulfill, thereby preventing them from securing their independence. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this bill, but I think possibly it is proper that I should announce my reasons for the votes which I intend to cast.

I am in favor of the bill as it stands, without the preamble. I am opposed to the preamble and to the amendments. I would vote, sir, now to give the Filipinos immediate freedom. I wish that it were in my power to cast a vote which would render them independent within half an hour after that vote is cast. I should have voted for the original Clarke amendment because it declared for immediate freedom, simply allowing two years' time in which the United States might remove from the Philippine Islands, but declaring for immediate liberty, thereby settling once for all the question which has agitated us in every political campaign now for the last 17 or 18 years. Mr. President, I believe that in so voting, if I had the opportunity, my vote would be against the interests of the Filipino people themselves; but I believe that in so voting it would be for the best interests of the people of the United States. For that reason I would so cast my vote had I the opportunity.

I for one, Mr. President, in these times am in favor of voting and caring for the interests of the people of the United States of America. It may be true that this Nation was born to serve mankind. If so, sir, in my judgment, the best service which we could render mankind now would be to perpetuate American institutions, to clear our decks for action, to notify the world that this is going to continue to be a great, strong, self-respecting Nation and a self-respecting Government, compelling the respect of the other nations of the earth. I think, sir, we are in a critical period in our history, and I believe that the Philippine Islands constitute the weak point in the line of our defense.

I believe, as I have said, that in casting my vote for the immediate independence of the Filipinos that vote would be against their interests. By continuing to hold out to the Filipinos the hope which has been extended to them in every campaign now for years without granting them that independence which you have agreed to grant them, I believe firmly, and I now prophesy, sir, to you that you will have trouble with the Filipinos themselves withon four years' time. I believe that the only way to rid ourselves of that trouble with the Filipinos—and very possibly with other nations of the world on account of the Filipinos—is for us, selfishly and—if you will have it so—in a cowardly manner, to allow them to assume their own burdens for a while and relieve the people of the United States of the burdens which they have been carrying for 17 or 18 years.

Mr. President, the last declaration in a political platform was only a repetition, not possibly in such strong terms, of prior declarations contained in the platform of the same political party. When this Government undertook to inaugurate a government for the Philippine Islands, when our soldiers were engaged in defending the laws of this country in the Philippines in time of war, our actions and the attempt to establish a government for the Filipinos was denounced, not only by platform declarations but in political speeches throughout the entire length and breadth of this country. That agitation has been kept up until to-day. Pledges have been made by one of the great political parties. It has been the understanding of the Filipinos that so soon as that party should have an opportunity, so soon as it should control this Government, it would immediately grant to them independence. You are now failing to do that, Senators. You are again holding out a hope, by these various propositions which you are offering in the shape of amendments to the bill itself, you are again saying to them that, "Although we have solemnly pledged ourselves in various campaigns, although every prominent man in our party has pledged himself to independence for the Filipinos, although we have reiterated those pledges, not only in times of political peace but in the stress of political campaigns, we again refer you to another administration; and not only are we leaving you to the tender care of another administration to carry out our pledges, but, as is set forth in the amendments, we are providing now that in the discretion of the President of the United States, in the event that the time is thought propitious, within four years or within six years, unless something shall have arisen, the Filipinos shall be granted independence, but the President of the United States shall judge." Inevitably, sir, something will have occurred in that time, in my judgment, which will cause the President of the United States to exercise his discretion; and inevitably the exercise of such discretion against the immediate independence in the Philippines would cause trouble and almost inevitably revolution in the Philippines. Then would the people of the United States undertake to put such revolution down and restore order? If so, would they again be denounced throughout the length and breadth of this country, in every congressional district and on the lecture platforms throughout the Chautauqua circuit, for oppressing the Philippine people? I say yes; they would; and I do not propose by my vote to assume that burden.

I do not believe that the present administration will have the final passing upon this proposition. I believe that the party in opposition now to the party in power will be called upon to carry out the provisions of this bill, and I believe, with due respect to my friends on the other side, that that is very largely the purpose of the proposed amendment, that they may shift from themselves the responsibility that they should be compelled to take upon themselves to carry out their pledges. They now have the opportunity to do what they have promised the people of the United States to do and what they have promised the Filipinos themselves that they would do as soon as they achieved that power. They are now shirking that responsibility and leaving it to another administration or to a second administration, possibly not with the hope, but I think rather firm in the belief, that that responsibility will not rest during either of those administrations upon the party now in power.

Believing that, sir, I, for one, refuse to accept the burden which they desire to shirk, and therefore if I had the opportunity I should vote for immediate independence for the Philippines, and I shall refuse to vote for any proposition deferring such action to another administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent, but is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CATRON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—24.

So the amendment of Mr. HITCHCOCK to the amendment of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has pending a group of amendments to the original amendment offered by myself, to some of which I have no objection; in fact, I think one or two of them would be an improvement, although I do not think that many of them would be. For instance, in line 11, on page 3, the provision is:

Immediately upon the passage of the act the President shall invite the the cooperation of the principal nations.

There is no objection to striking out the words "immediately upon" and inserting the word "after," so as to read "after the passage of this act," thus permitting the President to have such time as in his judgment may be necessary. I propose that amendment myself, if the Senator from Nebraska does not intend to present his amendments. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has the right to perfect his amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not after another proposition to amend has been presented. The Senator from Nebraska has one pending, but he does not seem to urge it.

While I am on my feet I believe I will say just a word or two. The delegation of power to the President is quite broad, and must necessarily be so. There is not a man occupying official station in the civilized world upon whom more powers have been conferred than upon the President of the United States, and the instances where it has been abused in dealing with international matters are so few in number that it is not a sane fear to assume that anything will be done intentionally that will not be for the benefit of the American people. Therefore, the amendment submitted by me delegates to him the power to—fully recognize the independence of the said Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof.

There is nothing in that amendment that requires the President to recognize a government that is not republican in form. Notwithstanding that phrase is not a very exact one, it does recognize the rule of the people and the recognition by the President of such government as the people have instituted. That is the test of freedom; that is the test of independence; and it is one that is included in this amendment.

Now, when we come to deal with the character of the obligations the President of the United States is required to safeguard, we authorize him—to enter into such negotiations with the authorities of said Philippines or others as may be necessary—

Not only with the Philippines, but with others—

as may be necessary to finally settle and adjust—

What?

all property rights and other relations as between the United States and the said Philippines.

If it is a fact that the United States Government, in the ratification of the treaty of Paris, has assumed certain obligations that it will require the people of the Philippines while under their jurisdiction to recognize, that provision may be well transferred to that people if it is one continuing in character. That is exactly what was done in the case of Cuba. We assumed the same burden in connection with the Cuban territory and people that we did in connection with the Philippines, the difference being that we paid for the Philippines and did not pay for Cuba. The Cuban territory and the Cuban people were released from American control by a joint resolution, which stipulated certain things that should be incorporated in the constitution of Cuba. That was deemed an adequate provision for those matters, and has proven adequate up to the present time.

Now, concerning the extension of a protectorate over the Philippines during the remaining five years after the expiration of the four years, plus an additional period if, in the opinion of the President, the same may become necessary, I have no particular view about that. I think it ought to be submitted to the Senate as an independent proposition. My own opinion is that the four years provided for on the face of the amendment, with that elastic extension of another year or a little more than a year, is an adequate period of preparation; and if the Senate see proper to say that that is adequate and will undertake to strike out the language of the last provision of the amendment, I am not prepared to say that they have done what they should not have done. My own opinion is that that is a separable and distinct provision.

So far as the great Governments of the world interested in the affairs of that part of the world are concerned, they will assume just such obligations as may respectively suit them. They are not going to engage in any wholesale guaranty of sovereignty of that comparatively small people. Just now as far as they would be willing to go would perhaps be to say, "We will not evade it and we will not violate it." Those that have no intimate relations may build up some intimate trade connections that may justify the assumption of a wider power.

Negotiations between independent peoples must be determined by agreement, consultation, and consideration of the advantages that are to flow from one to the other, and no one party to a negotiation can indicate what the other one shall do. For that reason we have left it somewhat elastic, as I think it ought to be. Some may decline to go in at all; some may be willing to take a wider responsibility than others; some may desire to go no further than to say, "We will do no more than to say that, so far as we are concerned, we will not violate the neutrality nor invade the independence of those people." That is quite as far as it is necessary to go.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be very glad to answer the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose that one of the nations should say to the President, "We are willing to recognize the neutrality and the independence of the Philippine Islands, but we are not willing to guarantee that independence," under the provisions of the Senator's amendment, could the President accept such an agreement?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Unquestionably he could. The power to refuse to join at all implies the power to go in on such terms as are mutually satisfactory.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that is not what the amendment says. It says:

Immediately upon the passage of the act, the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, in the form of a treaty or other character of binding agreement, whereby the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines, and also—

Now, there are two things that he must obtain under the terms of this bill. There are two things that the President must obtain in that treaty—not only an agreement that these nations will respect the independence of the Philippine Islands, but also that they shall guarantee their independence. Under it I can not see the power of the President to say that he will accept one provision, but under this amendment he can release the other nations from entering into the other obligation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That would apply to those who are willing to assume that form of obligation. Those who are not willing to assume it, of course, would assume a less one. I take it for granted that there will be some nations that will be willing to assume the broader obligation; but if any considerable number of the Senate seem to think that that is a limitation upon the power of the President, it is a matter of but a moment's time to strike it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or the Senator could strike out "and also" and insert "or to mutually obligate themselves."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota is a very good one, and I will accept it, if I have the permission of the Senate. It is to strike out the words "and also," in line 18, page 3, and insert the word "or."

With that statement I do not believe it is necessary for me to add anything.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas has omitted some of the suggestions which were made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish the Senator would bring them to the attention of the Senate. He discussed the matter with the Senator from Nebraska, and some of them really improve the text of the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is one on page 2, at line 5, where the following language appears:

Provided, That if the President, at the expiration of the said period of four years—

It was suggested by the Senator from Nebraska that the word "prior" or "before the expiration" should be inserted.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. "Prior to."

Mr. SHAFROTH. "Prior to." I ask unanimous consent that those words may be inserted instead of the word "at."

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is another one which was suggested by the Senator from Nebraska and which I think is a very good amendment, and to which, it seems to me, all ought to agree. It is on page 3, line 3, after the words "United States," to insert the words "and of other countries."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not objectionable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So that it would read:

Between the United States and the said Philippines, and to cause to be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded all of the personal and property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States and of other countries.

I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Another suggestion which the Senator from Nebraska made was to strike out, in line 7, page 3, the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; that ought to be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So that it will read in this way:

In any such settlement or adjustment so made in respect to the rights and property of the United States as against the said Philippines the President may reserve or acquire such lands and rights and privileges appurtenant thereto as may, in his judgment, be required by the United States for naval bases and coaling stations within the territory of said Philippines.

I ask unanimous consent that the word "shall" may be stricken out and the word "may" inserted in lieu thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will inquire whether the word "immediately" was stricken out, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas, and the word "after" inserted, in line 11, page 3?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The words "immediately upon" were stricken out and the word "after" inserted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that is all.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether an amendment proposing to strike out certain portions of the Clarke amendment would be in order at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. KENYON. I therefore move as an amendment that all of that part of the Clarke amendment commencing on page 3 with the word "immediately" be stricken from the amendment.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I think there are some who would be glad to vote for the Clarke amendment were it not for the guaranty that is made as to our country and the period of time that is specified. I should myself. If that amendment can be made, I shall be glad to support the Clarke amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. May we have the amendment stated again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is to strike out all of the Clarke amendment after the word "After" on line 11, page 3. Beginning at line 11, on page 3, it is proposed to strike out all thereafter. The words proposed to be struck out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

After the passage of the act, the President shall invite the cooperation of the prnicipal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, in the form of a treaty or other character of binding agreement, whereby the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines, and also to mutually obligate themselves, equally and not one primarily nor to any greater extent than another, to maintain as against external force the sovereignty of said Philippines. If any of the nations so invited to join the United States in such undertaking shall decline to do so, then the President shall include as parties to such convention or agreement such nations as may be willing to join therein and to assume such obligations; and if none are willing to so unite therein, then the President is authorized to give such guaranty on behalf of the United States alone for the period of five years from and after the expiration of said period of four years, or any extension thereof, and pending the existence of such separate guaranty by the United States, the United States shall be entitled to retain and exercise such control and supervision in the said Philippines as may be necessary to enforce order therein and to avoid external complications.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. I am requested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] to announce that his colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained by reason of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 31, as follows:

So Mr. KENYON's amendment to the amendment of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent and is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire whether the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withdraw my vote, having a pair with him.

The roll call resulted—yeas 41, nays 41, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] the yeas are 41 and the nays are 41. The Chair votes "yea," and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 20, after the word "land" and the comma, it is proposed to insert the word "water" and a comma.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this bill as presented by the committee provides that all concessions in respect to land, timber, and mining rights which are a part of the public domain shall be subject to the approval of the President. It seems to me that the same reason which would make these rights subject to the approval of the President would apply with equal force to the granting of water rights; and it is for that reason that I offer the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I move that the Philippine bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Philippines.

In explanation of that motion I wish to say that the Philippine bill as it was written was a consistent piece of legislation according to the theory on which it was proposed. I do not agree with the execution of that theory in all its parts, although I recognize that as a general proposition it was carrying out the policy which has heretofore prevailed in the Philippine Islands. The Philippine bill as it now stands, with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas upon it, is not only an inconsistent piece of legislation, but a very dangerous piece of legislation.

As the Philippine bill now stands, it provides that there shall be an enormous increase in the electorate of the Philippine Islands. It provides that an electorate which now consists of only some 275,000 qualified voters shall be increased to between——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for order in the Chamber. The Senator from Rhode Island is making a very interesting statement, and it ought to be listened to.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was saying, Mr. President, that this bill increases the electorate from some 275,000 qualified voters to an estimated electorate of between eight and nine hundred thousand qualified voters. The new amendment which has been put upon the bill provides for the independence of the Philippine Islands within a period of from two to four years from now. At just the time that goes into effect the new electorate will for the first time undertake to cast a vote in the Philippine Islands. The Philippine authorities who will be compelled to take up the burden of organizing those islands and carrying out the great responsibilities of the government of those islands under the bill as it now stands will have a government that is elected, not by the 275,000 trained and partially trained Philippine electors, but by an electorate composed of citizens more than two-thirds of whom never have cast a vote in their lives, many of whom will not understand the meaning of a vote, and a large number of whom have no common language of communication and do not understand any language in which a literature of any size is available to them.

I say to the Senators from the South, who have had some experience of that sort, that it will be more or less reproducing in the Philippine Islands the same situation which occurred in the Southern States during the reconstruction period, when they had an enormous ignorant colored vote thrust into their affairs.

It is impossible to suppose that an electorate composed as this electorate will be in the Philippine Islands will be of a character and ability equal even to running a government that has already been established, much less to undertaking the great responsibilities of establishing a new form and character of government.

For us to undertake under these new conditions to pass this bill, to carry out these various changes in the Philippine situation as has been proposed under the original bill, would seem to me in its possibilities for trouble and chances for insurrection almost as—I do not want to use any extreme expression—but it would seem to me to be almost a criminal proceeding in the light of the great responsibility that we have assumed in regard to those people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In view of the fact that we have now adopted an amendment by which we are to run away from the Philippine Islands, finally and irrevocably, within the next four years, what advantage does the Senator from Rhode Island see in our trying to perfect this proposed legislation or to pass it in any form whatever? In other words, in view of the adoption of that amendment, why is not the wise thing to do to reject every part of the bill except the amendment? Is it not sufficient, in view of that fact, to permit the organic act as it now is found upon the statute books to remain in force? Will not that take care of the situation for four years? Why should we waste our time in undertaking to perfect a piece of legislation which is to be temporary, and which, in all probability, can not even be put in working operation for the next two or three years?

Mr. LIPPITT. Not only in all probability can it not be put in operation, but it is almost an absolute certainty that it can not be put into operation.

If, Mr. President, the theory of the gentlemen who are responsible for Philippine legislation is going to be the theory that is in the amendment which has been proposed by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], that is one situation. If our attitude on the Philippine Islands is to be one of continuing protection, then the theory in the bill that was reported by the committee has its justification. But to attempt to mix up those two things, to undertake to project into those islands—which will have difficulties enough in establishing an independent system of government without any complications—an utterly new and untried system of government, it seems to me is objectionable from every viewpoint. It is in a sense impertinent. If we are going to pass over to those people their country, to be governed by themselves, let us pass it over to them without complications and let them arrange for themselves how they will govern it. There is no necessity for the American Congress to undertake under these changed conditions to prescribe all the details of governmental operations. If we are going to make them independent, by all means let us make them independent. Certainly we do not want to undertake to compel those people to organize their new and independent government under what are practically the same conditions that prevailed in the States of the South after the War of the Rebellion.

Mr. President, there are, I think, no doubt, very inconsistent provisions in this bill under the present theory upon which it is being written. I do not believe it is possible that a bill of this kind can be perfected on the floor of the Senate. No committee has ever undertaken to write this bill under the theory which is now the basis of the bill. It seems to me, for the purpose of wise legislation, of reasonable care in this question, the bill should be recommitted.

Gentlemen here must not forget, and I do not forget, that we are not dealing now with a commercial question; we are not dealing with a question that simply involves more or less dollars and cents to the country or to individuals; we are dealing with a question that involves the existence of human life. We are dealing with one of the most dangerous questions that has ever come before this body.

There is plenty of evidence in the testimony which has been given before the committee of men competent to express an opinion to the effect that the result of the action which has been taken here to-day will inevitably result in insurrection. It is a very common opinion held by both Americans and Filipinos who are familiar with the Philippine Islands. Under those circumstances I say to you gentlemen who are responsible for this legislation at least let the Filipinos establish their independent government under the most favorable circumstances that we can devise.

I hope the bill will be returned to the committee. You can instruct them as you wish as to some time to report, but let it be returned there that the members of the committee, in the quiet of their committee room, undisturbed as they are here by conflicting opinions, may prepare something that is consistent with the new conditions that have been put in the bill by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. It is not a simple matter you are doing; it is a very serious one. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the matter has been discussed about as fully as it would be if it were referred. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will withdraw his motion. I think those Senators who have supported his amendment and who are interested in it ought to be permitted to express their views.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no objection to that. I will withdraw it for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Minnesota or anyone else to discuss it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to say for myself that there is great force in this position. I am a member of the committee. We framed the bill along one line of thought and purpose, and now that the Senate has definitely settled that some provision of independence shall be associated with the bill, I think it very appropriate that the bill should go back to the committee for consideration by the committee in the light of the determination of the Senate that fundamentally and basically the Senate is for a declaration providing for the independence of the islands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I voted against the Clarke amendment. There is one thing, however, that the Clarke amendment does. It does provide for the independence of the Philippine Islands. That amendment must also pass the House. I feel that if the bill goes back to the committee the chances will be against ever securing during this session any final adjudication of the question. Certainly the length of time it has taken on the floor of the Senate so far would indicate that it would probably be laid aside before being finally acted upon.

I am willing to trust to the good judgment of the House upon the bill as it stands in the Senate, and I for one, while I voted against the Clarke amendment, shall vote against the recommittal of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, unless some other Senator desires to discuss it, I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to make any remarks further than a simple statement. I am a member of the Philippines Committee and have given this bill some attention.

I want to say to the Senate that it is my opinion that the bill with this amendment upon it will be a sort of an absurdity, and that since the amendment has been adopted the bill ought to be redrafted in order to make it consistent with the theory of the amendment.

I simply wanted to make that statement, and that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to say in explanation of my vote on the motion to recommit that the amendment which was adopted is entirely a distinct piece of legislation from the bill to which it has been attached. It is as important, perhaps, as any piece of legislation that will come before this body, and it has never been considered in committee. The confusion that existed here in the debate this morning as to the effect of the various amendments and the policy of the government under them indicates to me the need of some sort of executive consideration of this proposition.

I have no right to prophesy in this matter, but I am very much inclined to think that if the bill passes as it is now with this amendment, within a month the United States will be involved in serious trouble in the Philippine Islands in maintaining order and peace.

I think that the same rules which provide for committees of the Senate and which require proposed legislation to be referred to committees apply with full force in this instance, and that the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island be laid on the table? The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and vote on this question "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] as heretofore to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] did not vote. I have a general pair with that Senator. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as I understand my pair, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], has been called from the Chamber.

Mr. CATRON. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] I vote "nay."

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 29, as follows:

So Mr. LIPPITT's motion was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is one offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 20, after the word "land" and the comma, insert the word "water" and a comma, so as to read:

Providing for the disposition or concessions in respect of land, water, timber, and mining rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I offer the following as an additional section to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The sum of $20,000,000 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the President, through the Philippine Commission, in aid of the instruction of the Filipinos in a common language, in the principles of free government, and in industrial pursuits; and also in aid of an agricultural bank in the Philippines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have voted for the so-called Clarke amendment because I believe that we should never have been in the Philippines, and I believe that it is to the interest of this country that we should get out of the Philippines as soon as possible. But I want the United States to get out of those islands with honor. We have thus far been training the Filipino people through their own taxation in a common language. They have been able to apply from their own income $2,000,000 annually for the education of 500,000 children, although there are 2,000,000 children there of school age, thus expending only about $4 per annum upon each child in school. We expend in this country $30 per annum upon each child in school, nearly $600,000,000 annually in the aggregate, and we have 20,000,000 children at school out of a total population of 100,000,000. They have made good progress in the Philippine Islands in securing a common language with so limited a fund.

We ought 15 years ago to have commenced an appropriation in aid of giving those people a common language, because, in my judgment, that is absolutely essential for the establishment of free government in the islands. We will now have five years probably of possession of those islands. During that time a great advance can be made in training those people in a common language and in industrial pursuits and in the principles of free government. The question is whether we will leave them to their own limited funds or whether we will help them.

The insular revenue amounts to about $11,000,000 annually. The insular and municipal revenues combined amount to about $17,000,000 annually. They have therefore available for the government and the education of 7,000,000 people a sum about equal to the amount that is expended in the District of Columbia for the government and education of 350,000 people.

The situation therefore appeals to us. If we really wish to train them in a common language, if we wish to train them in the principles of free government, if we wish to train them in industrial pursuits, we have an opportunity now for five years. Are we going, by reason of a mistaken economy, to fail to do, as fully and completely as possible, the work which we inaugurated? We spent in the war which involved the conquest of the Philippines $600,000,000. We have expended since in fortifications, in increased military and naval expense connected with the retention of the Philippines about $500,000,000 more—over a billion dollars in all. Are we going to refuse now to furnish $20,000,000 more with a view to perfecting, as far as possible, the job which we inaugurated?

I observed that a smile spread over the faces of Senators when this subject was introduced. The idea of largess to the people of whom we are about to rid ourselves was apparently ridiculous. I take no humorous view of the situation, I care not what the condition of the Federal Treasury is. We have a sacred obligation resting upon us so long as we hold those islands, and we intend to hold them for five years longer. It is the most objectionable parsimony that bids us halt now and refuse to give the few millions that are necessary to the successful accomplishment of what we have in view.

Mr. President, I have little faith in the success of republican government among savage or semicivilized people. Devoted as we are to democratic government, it seems to me that experience must teach us that democratic government is only suited to people of the highest intelligence and the greatest self-control. A savage, a barbarous, or a semicivilized people have not such intelligence and such self-control.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will permit me to go on with my thought.

I fear that republican government will rail in the Philippines. We will have there after a time revolutions in the place of elections. The revolutions will determine the officials of the Philippine Islands, not the elections. So far as I am concerned I want to do everything that I can in the way of training those people in such a way that the governing officials of the islands will be determined by the voluntary choice of the people and not by force, as is the case with almost all our Central American and South American Republics.

Now, Mr. President, we have lost the opportunity of 15 years. We have been parsimonious when we should have been liberal. We have allowed the governmental, educational, and training system of those islands to be conducted upon insufficient funds secured by local taxation only $17,000,000 annually, a sum hardly sufficient for the 350,000 people of the District of Columbia. We have an opportunity now to correct our mistakes, and we have only five years in which to do it. Are we going to cut the tie that binds those islands to us without making proper provision in the matter of training them for self-government?

When I was in the Philippine Islands the Filipinos were still plowing with a stick. There has been some improvement since, but I am told there has not been very much. There have been some improved methods of sugar cultivation introduced, which were of the crudest order when I was there. We are now about to turn those islands loose without the benefits of the reciprocal tariff which they now have with us, under which they get 50 per cent more for their sugar than they would otherwise get, and a very considerable percentage more for their tobacco than they would otherwise get.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask not to be interrupted. They will be thrown into the world's markets unsustained by this joint protective system, which they now have with us. Will they be prepared for the industrial competition, and is it not our duty to prepare them for that industrial competition, and how can we better accomplish it than by training those people in improved methods of agriculture? That involves the creation of an agricultural bank, which can make loans to the small farmers, with a view of enabling them to get the implements that are necessary for improved methods. That need has been apparent for 15 years. Every Governor General of the Philippine Islands has commented upon the absolute necessity of an agricultural bank. The matter was broached in legislation years ago, and the proposal was practically defeated by the substitution of a measure which gave the Philippine Government itself the power to establish an agricultural bank out of its limited funds. It has been unable to furnish to that bank, I believe, any more than a half million dollars in capital. That has been utterly inadequate to meet the requirements of those people. When I was in the islands extreme cases of usury existed. Interest was charged at the rate of 50 and 100 per cent. These interest charges kept the producers always under the control of the money lenders and practically absorbed the profits of production.

Mr. President, the chief danger to the Philippine Islands will come not from the outside but from within. The chief danger of the Philippine Islands is revolution. Revolution always comes as the result of economic distress. Look over the history of all the revolutions in Cuba, in Central America, and in the South American Republics and you will find that their source is almost always economic distress. We thus throw these islands into the ocean, depriving them of the supports which they have thus far had by reason of their reciprocal tariff with us; depriving them of all their aids in getting large and favored prices in this country; remitting them to the fierce competition of the world without taking any steps to arm them against the new conditions.

I do not believe that we should maintain favored relations with them even by treaty. I do not believe in reciprocal tariffs between nations. I believe that our whole fiscal system should be an independent one, unconnected with that of any other country, and that the rule should be, so far as all other countries are concerned, the rigid rule of impartiality. Partiality to any country involves favors which arouse the hostility of other countries.

We have no right, in my judgment, by a favored relation with the Philippine Islands, to absolutely insure the importation of their products into this country and the importation of our products into theirs, thus cutting off the trade of other nations with the Philippine Islands. I think the entire Orient has the right to complain of our inconsistency in demanding an "open door"—equiality of opportunity—in China and in Korea and at the same time closing the door to equal opportunity among the nations in the Philippine Islands. We must, therefore, end the favored relations between those islands and this country; and, unless we provide for that crisis, it will surely result in economic distress that will breed revolution within six months after we withdraw.

After expending a billion dollars in the military aspects of imperialism and colonialism, can we not spend $20,000,000 more in the peaceful work of preparing the people of the Philippines for self-dependence and self-help in the difficult undertaking before them of substituting independence for dependence? What better method can we take than to put $20,000,000 unreservedly in the hands of the President of the United States and instruct him, with the aid of the Philippine Commission, to expend it in aid of training those people in a common language, training them in the principles of free government, training them in industrial pursuits, and in aid of an agricultural bank, which will mean the advancement of intelligent industry throughout the islands?

I trust this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to tender an amendment, to be a separate section of this bill, and I ask to have it read and that it lie over and be printed, and not to be considered until to-morrow, as I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines desires to have the bill reprinted; in other words, I waive discussion at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the amendment I have offered be taken up to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] will be printed and lie upon the table. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Nevada made a similar request as to the amendment offered by him. If that request is granted, of course it will delay the passage of the bill for to-day. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska what is his purpose to do from this time forward?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was on the point of asking unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside, and that a print of the bill as amended be laid before the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Together with the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and one offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to have my amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That before the independence and sovereignty of the Philippine Islands shall be proclaimed by the President of the United States the government of the Philippine Islands as constituted shall make and execute a perpetual treaty with the United States guaranteeing freedom of trade to the United States and exemption from all import tariff duties upon any goods, merchandise, or trade from the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Nebraska make a request that the bill be temporarily laid aside at this point?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that is my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And for the printing of the bill as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires first to offer an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nebraska refers to an amendment which I suggested on yesterday. It was merely a verbal amendment to change the place in the bill of the words "sectarian institutions." I think the Secretary has the amendment at the desk. All I desire is that the bill shall be so printed as to show the amendment which I offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the bill being temporarily laid aside until to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. Before that is done, Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska. I will ask the Senator to read lines 20, 21, and 22, on page 6 of the bill, and see if they are not at least badly punctuated, and if there is not the omission of a word.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (after examining the bill). I think there is no error, except as to punctuation, and that can be corrected by the Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, the language should be correctly punctuated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to temporarily laying the bill aside?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have an amendment to the bill, but I am not sure whether or not it has been formally offered, and I should like to have the amendment printed in connection with the bill, if there is to be a reprint.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, has the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not yet been agreed to. The Chair is unable to ascertain what the Senate desires to do. Is there objection to temporarily laying the bill aside? The Chair hears none, and the bill is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a reprint of the bill as amended up to this time be laid before the Senate to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With all proposed amendments?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. With all amendments which have so far been adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Other Senators have asked that amendments which have been offered should also be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to that, but that is a separate request. My request is for a reprint of the bill as amended up to this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask, in addition, that the reprint shall also show in brackets the pending amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION (H. DOC. NO. 646).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, stating that balance sheets and other information required by the Public Utilities Commission of the various utilities under its jurisdiction received on or before February 1, 1916, had been submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TENTS FOR FLOOD-STRICKEN DISTRICTS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I introduce a bill calling upon the Secretary of War to supply for temporary use tents for destitute persons in flood-stricken districts, which I ask may be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (S. 4155) to authorize the Secretary of War to supply tents for temporary use of destitute persons in flood-stricken districts, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection with the bill, I desire to have printed in the RECORD certain telegrams which I have received, one being from the mayor of Arkansas City.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARKANSAS CITY, ARK., January 31, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Send me at Arkansas City 100 Government tents; 500 families in destitute condition. Need supplies at once. Whole country under water here. Have wired Col. TAYLOR. Answer.

C. C. HEMINGWAY, Mayor.

DOUGLAS, ARK., February 1, 1916.

Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Levees broken in three places on both ends of State farm and at Douglas. Send provisions for 300 families, and hay for stock. Thousands of acres flooded.

C. W. DIXON.
W. W. DOUGLASS.
R. E. LAKE.

HELENA, ARK., February 2, 1916.

Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

You no doubt are familiar with the misfortune which has befallen our locality. I think it will be a question of a short time until we will have to appeal to the Government for relief. In fact, our board of trade has already made this appeal. If the Government should send officers in here to take charge of this situation, will ask you to use your influence in securing Lieut. Hanna and Quartermaster Clerk Dulin, if available. Both have been here and are familiar with conditions. We will appreciate any help you may give us.

AMOS JARMAN.

CENTRAL HEATING, LIGHTING, AND POWER PLANT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that joint resolution No. 92, relative to the construction on the site selected of the central heating, lighting, and power plant authorized by the provisions of the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 23, 1913, introduced by me on the 29th ultimo, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In connection with the joint resolution I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the American Federation of Arts, which I ask may be referred with the resolution to the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF ARTS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate,
United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The American Federation of Arts, the national art organization of America, representing 210 of the leading art museums, art societies, and associations throughout the United States, desires to respectfully make protest against the proposed erection of a power plant at Fourteenth and Water Streets in the city of Washington in accordance with plans recently designed under the supervision of the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and disapproved by the Federal Commission of Fine Arts.

The erection of such a building, 80 or 90 feet in height, surmounted by four smokestacks 16 feet in diameter and 195 feet above the water line, would be seriously detrimental to the beauty of our National Capital, becoming a dominant note in almost every vista, and perpetually marring the beautiful park system which is being developed with so much skill and such excellent effect under the direction of Congress.

The American Federation of Arts therefore earnestly asks your cooperation in preventing the erection of such a building on such a site, which would not only permanently disfigure the city of Washington, but would stand as a monumental witness to the ill-judgment of those under whose direction and by whose order it was erected.

It is earnestly hoped that through the intervention of yourself and others such misfortune may be avoided.

I am, sir,

Very respectfully, yours, LEILA MECHLIN, Secretary.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. GORE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) to amend the Constitution of the United States relative to calling out the militia, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the fifteenth paragraph of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ART. XVIII. The Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, and carry on war."

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PITTMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,600 for the payment of rental of private land occupied by nonreservation homeless Indians in the vicinity of Sparks, Nev., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 87 to print the manuscript entitled "Electric Power Development in the United States and Concentration in its Ownership and Control." There was objection a few days ago to unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution, but it ought to be acted upon promptly, if at all, and it ought to be favorably acted upon at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are one or two Senators, not now in the Chamber, who desire to speak upon the resolution; and if the Senator from Florida now asks for its consideration, I shall object at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have moved that the resolution be taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator that, if he insists upon having the resolution considered to-night, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum, so that the Senators to whom I have referred may be present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the first place, there is no order in the Senate Chamber; in the second place, the Chair is unable to hear one word that is being said. The Chair did not hear a single word which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said, but thinks it was a request of some kind.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska rose to make some inquiry, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from Florida had asked unanimous consent to consider Senate resolution 87, providing for the printing of certain material for use in connection with the proposed water-power bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that is the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. And I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was inclined to object to that. I do not believe any Senator is absolutely opposed to the printing of the material referred to. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that some Senators may be opposed to the printing of the diagrams or illustrations or something of that kind, but I have not heard anyone object to the printing of the text. I have abundant evidence, I will say to the Senator from Utah, direct from the office of the Secretary of Agriculture that the statement made when this resolution was previously under consideration that the material could all be found somewhere else is really without foundation when the subject is investigated. A very great deal of it is absolutely new, and that portion of it which can be found in the records of the various departments is scattered so that it would require a year's time, perhaps, for any one man to get it together.

We have spent already over $20,000 in gathering this information in response to a resolution of the Senate instructing the Secretary to gather it. We have two water-power bills on the calendar now, with a notice on the calendar that a motion is to be made to take one of them up when we get through with the Philippine bill. We ought to have this information, and we ought to have it soon, if it is to do any good in connection with the bills which are coming up for consideration, and I hope the Senator will not delay the matter by calling for a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will be compelled to call for a quorum if the resolution is to be considered now, but I do not intend to object to its consideration. I am perfectly willing that it shall be considered, but the Senators who spoke to me in relation to this matter, who wanted to submit some remarks upon it, are not present, and it is for that reason that I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator wishes to suggest the absence of a quorum, that is his privilege, of course. We will have to secure a quorum. If he objects to the consideration of the resolution by unanimous consent, I will move to take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to taking up the resolution, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution 87, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 87) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the report entitled "Electric Power Development in the United States and Concentration in its Ownership and Control," transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of Agriculture on January 20, 1916, in response to Senate resolution No. 544, Sixty-third Congress, be printed as a Senate document, together with accompanying tables and illustrations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Husting	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	James	Norris	Smoot
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver	Stone
Chilton	Jones	Overman	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pittman	Townsend
Colt	Lane	Poindexter	Underwood
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Vardaman
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Reed	Wadsworth
du Pont	Lewis	Robinson	Walsh
Fall	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Williams
Fletcher	Lodge	Shafroth
Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard
Gronna	McLean	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

The resolution is before the Senate by unanimous consent. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who seems particularly interested in this resolution, whether it is his purpose to object to the consideration of the water-power bills until the report referred to in the pending resolution is printed?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Nebraska knows very well that in a general way our ideas are quite in accord in reference to the proposed legislation, and I should feel that it would be exceedingly regrettable if, when we seek to get these measures before the Senate, some Senator should object to their consideration because this material is not here for use.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will say that I do not intend to object; in fact, for some time I have been industriously trying to get this matter printed and in usable shape. I realize that, if the Philippine bill should be disposed of within the next day or two and the Senate should decide to take up one of the water-power bills, we would not have this information before us for some time at least; but if the first water-power bill shall be before the Senate anywhere near so long a time as we have given to the bill now before the Senate, we will probably have the information before we are through with that bill, and if not then, before we take up the next bill. In any event, it will be available to the Members of the House when the bill we pass, if we do pass a bill before the information is available here, shall be taken up in the House. In other words, it seems to me that, after we have spent the Government funds to gather this information, a large part of which has never before been gathered together, and such portions as have been given at various times before various committees are scattered through hundreds of reports, we should have it printed and put in shape, so that it would be readily usable in case we should desire it. It seems to me we ought to have it available at the very first possible moment, certainly before we get through with this question.

So far as I am concerned, I would not object to the bill, even if my objection would succeed in delaying it—and it would not, as it could be taken up in any event on motion, and I understand it will be taken up in that way—but it seems to me that every day, every moment that we delay the printing of this material, which has been gathered by the office of the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance to a resolution of this body, we are making it more difficult for Members of this body intelligently to pass upon the various questions that will arise in the course of the discussion and consideration of proposed water-power legislation.

I have in my hand a copy of a letter from Mr. Graves, Chief of the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture, in which he outlines to some considerable extent the information contained in this report. For instance, he says:

> The work of preparation of the report began about the 1st of March, and was prosecuted continuously until the middle of December, by the full office force of the Chief Engineer, aided by certain details from the field, by the several district engineers, and by a force of clerks, stenographers, and draftsmen.

He says in another place:

> In order that the data on concentration in the ownership and control of power development might be correct and might be of sufficiently recent date to be of value, a special census of electric power was made for the United States. This involved the time of one man with clerical and stenographic assistance for 10 months. This material is entirely new, is not available anywhere except in the report, and has never been presented before. On the basis of the special power census the tabulations showing the concentration in the control and ownership of power were prepared. These tabulations are therefore entirely new. While information upon concentration was presented for water powers alone by the Commissioner of Corporations in 1912 and for electric power in 1913 for several of the Western States at hearings before the Public Lands Committees of the House and Senate, the information as contained in the report has never been presented before in any form for the majority of the States or been brought up to date for any of the States. The material in section 2 of the report is therefore entirely new.

There are other parts of it that are entirely new. He says in another place in this letter:

> In hearings before the Public Lands Committees of the House and Senate certain material has been presented by representatives of this department along the lines of part 3 of the report; but such material as was presented in the hearings involved only a few corporations and amounted to less than one-tenth of the data presented in the report, while the data concerning the relations of public utility electric companies to banking institutions has never been presented before.

They have worked, as I understand, diligently and have done everything they could to expedite the gathering of the data in order that we might have this information for the purpose of intelligently legislating on the proposed water-power legislation. Although, in my judgment, it would be wise if the consideration of the water-power bills were delayed for a week or so in order to get this information, I am not going to ask that even that delay take place.

I agree with the Senator from Montana. I think that this is a subject that we ought to legislate upon in some manner, in some form, at this session of Congress, and I am just as anxious that we legislate as soon as possible as is the Senator from Montana or as is any other Senator, but we ought to get all the information we possibly can.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, if he will permit, with the consent of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. I am occupying the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Montana, for the purpose of answering his question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator has expressed his views upon this subject. Would it not be better to adopt the suggestion which was made the other day by the Senator from Washington, and print the printed part, which will cost very little? Then, after that is delivered to the Senate, we can look through it and see whether it is necessary to print the other; and if so, do it. I understand that the printed part, which is in a separate volume, could be printed in four or five days.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad the Senator made that suggestion, because I intended to say something along that line. If we adopt the resolution as the committee has brought it in here, my understanding is that the first thing that will be done under the resolution will be to print the material suggested by the Senator from Colorado. We can use that while they are getting out the other part.

I am informed by those who know more about the material than I do—I have not had any opportunity to examine it—that it would materially affect the value of this document if these diagrams were not printed. But if we adopt the resolution, I understand—and I believe the Senator from Florida, who is the chairman of the Committee on Printing, will bear me out; if I am wrong, of course I want to be corrected—that we can get the printed part mentioned by the Senator from Colorado printed first, and we can be using that while they are finishing up the complete work. That would be worth a good deal, even though we did not get any more of it than that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the only objection I would have to printing it all now would be the fact that it might not be worth the sum of $13,500 simply for the illustrations. These illustrations, as I understand, make a bird's-eye view of just what is said in the report; and the very fact that the report is printed in a separate volume shows that people can understand it without that object lesson being right before them.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say that I think they could understand it; at least, my understanding is that they could; but it would very materially aid them if these diagrams were printed in connection with the text.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It might; but if we get the report here in three or four days and then look through it and decide that we want the report in full, I say we should get it, even if it does cost a good deal.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida, who has examined the material and who is chairman of the committee bringing in this resolution, what he thinks about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, I will state that the report is in this shape: It is presented in three parts. Part 1 contains the text of the report, which is this which I hold in my hand. Part 2 contains—

> The plates and tables concerning primary power, power generated, and financial statistics; the detailed data of power development in 1915; the summary tables showing the concentration in control of this power; and maps of 14 of the public-land States showing the location of all power plants, main transmission systems, and national forest areas.

Part 3 contains—

> The data concerning the interrelations between public service holding companies and the relation of these companies to certain banking corporations, diagrams showing the successive steps by which certain holding companies have established their control over operating companies, and charts indicating the relation through directors or principal officers of certain public-utility holding companies with each other.

These three parts, it seems to me, can be printed separately. Part 1, which is the text, could be printed without delay in a very few days.

I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have not any idea at all of causing the slightest delay in reference to the pending measures. I am in thorough sympathy with the bill which has been noted as the next measure to be taken up, and I do not believe that any delay would be occasioned by agreeing to the resolution in favor of printing this report. The parts that contain the diagrams and maps could follow along as quickly as possible, but the whole resolution ought to be adopted and the full report turned out as rapidly as it can be done. I do not believe a month's time will be required to print all the diagrams and all the maps and charts in connection with the report, but the text can be gotten out within a very few days—three or four days, I should think.

The matter is a very important one, and I do not believe there would be the slightest reason for causing delay in the consideration of the bills, because if we do not have this report printed the same contention could be made that we need further information on it. If we do have it printed, and it is out in time for use, so much the better. If it is not all out before we finish the bills, some of it surely will be, but portions of it might be delayed beyond that, and still it is a very valuable contribution to this great question concerning one of the most important natural resources in the whole country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does the statement the Senator has just made include all of the printing that is involved and which the resolution covers, and which I think the Senator stated the other day would cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $22,000?

Mr. FLETCHER. Nearly $21,000; twenty thousand nine hundred and some dollars.

Mr. THOMAS. Are there any illustrations or pictures of any sort except the diagrams and charts of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are no pictures, no photographic illustrations, except these. Here is one of the books which the Senator can examine and see for himself.

Mr. THOMAS. I saw that when the Senator had it the other morning. I noted that.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I read from the report the locations, the plans, the maps of these public-land States are here; and as they are colored, time is required to put them in shape and get them printed.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask if it is intended to duplicate the size of the charts and diagrams in the volume the Senator has before him?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no; no, indeed. They will be about the size of this smaller volume.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not to be understood as voicing any opposition whatever to the printing of this interesting, and doubtless valuable, information for the use of the Senate. I entertain no doubt that it will be serviceable, not only here but elsewhere throughout the country, without any reference to the bearing it may have upon the water-power bills now pending in this body.

But, Mr. President, we must bear in mind the fact that, unfortunately, this has been a subject of heated controversy now for a period of 10 years. The measures that are to be presented to this body for consideration are very stoutly resisted, both in matters of principle and in matters of detail. It is scarcely to be expected but that those gentlemen who do not want to see those measures passed will be urging before this body, and urging with much force and much emphasis, that having gone to the expense of $15,000 or $20,000 for the purpose of having printed material bearing upon the question, it would be quite improper, or at least inadvisable, to enter upon the consideration of those measures until that matter is laid before the Senate. If that course is unfortunately taken, other measures—the naval and military appropriation bills, the shipping bill, and various other bills—will have arrived at such condition as that they will be in shape for consideration by the body, and, as a matter of course, they will displace everything else.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the Senator to pardon me for just a moment.

On the other hand, there are extremists who view this matter as of the very essence of the questions involved in the two measures to which I have adverted. Now, if I may be at liberty to express my own opinion about the matter, I undertake to say that the question of whether the water powers of this country have, as a matter of fact, passed into monopolistic control or have not passed into monopolistic control, is only in the most incidental way relevant to the discussion of the merits of those two measures. To a very large extent probably no one will dispute that that is the condition of things, and the legislation will go on in the light of what will probably be conceded in that respect. So I trust that this does not mean that we are going to have consideration of those measures.

Mr. President, since the river-regulation and dam bill was vetoed, in the year 1906, my recollection is—some 10 years ago—this matter has been a subject of agitation and discussion, not only in both Houses of Congress but in the journals throughout the country; and time and again all of those great interests of this country that have been interested in establishing that conclusion—and they have been patriotic and energetic—have furnished the country with a world of information about it. I have no doubt in the world that this report adds much, and much that is valuable, to that, and for that reason I do not desire to be understood as in any manner objecting to the printing of it; but I trust that neither the antagonists of the measure nor those who favor it as it will be presented to the Senate will be urging that further consideration of it be postponed until this information is brought before the Senate.

I therefore hope that the solution suggested may be reached, namely, that it be given to us in installments, as fast as possible; and that we proceed, in the light of such information as comes to us, with the consideration of those measures in the passage of which, to my mind, there is involved so much of the future of this country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the printing clerk of the Senate informs me that the text of the report, exclusive of illustrations, which is comprised within the covers of the black book on the desk of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], comprises practically all the information in the report, and that it could be printed in 24 hours, at a cost not to exceed $700. I understand that the Senator from Florida has just made that statement in my absence. It seems to me that that would be the better course to pursue, and I will ask the Senator from Florida if he does not think it would be.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have just said, Mr. President, that the report is in three parts; that one part can be gotten out immediately and the next can follow shortly after and the next as quickly as possible after that. I think that is entirely practicable; I think that is the way it could be done; but the resolution——

Mr. MYERS. If it is printed in its entirety, I hope the chairman of the Committee on Printing will have the part contained in the black leather covers on his desk printed and given to us first, without any delay. I apprehend that the furnishing of the illustrations and designs does not make so much difference, and the printer may have them for any length of time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana, as he seems to be somewhat of the same opinion as I, if the printed part of this report can not be printed, and if we can not then determine whether the great expenditure involved in printing the illustrations should be made?

Mr. MYERS. I suppose that could be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do I understand that the printed part of the report would cost only $700?

Mr. MYERS. That is my recollection. I was told that that is the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it will cost $700 and the other will cost $20,000, and everything that is in the report is in the printed part, it does seem to me that we will be extravagant if we provide that all of it shall be done without each Senator examining the matter to see whether or not he thinks it is of that value.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he knows the cost of that work?

Mr. FLETCHER. About twenty thousand nine hundred dollars and something.

Mr. VARDAMAN. For what number of copies?

Mr. FLETCHER. The regular number—1,345 copies. Five hundred copies go to the public libraries, so many to the Senate, and so many to the House.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would be the total cost of the whole report.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, all this matter was debated for quite a while the other day. I wish the Senator could get a vote on the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing to vote. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that it probably would cost $700 to print the typewritten portion of this report, but there are some illustrations in connection with this portion, outside of the plans and maps, and so forth, which would cost about $7,000. I gave the figures the other day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me, then, that we could print the typewritten part, together with what illustrations are in the typewritten part. Evidently they are referred to directly on the pages of the report; but when you turn to another volume, or two other volumes, it is not necessary that they should be there to confirm what is stated in the printed part. It seems to me that if we authorize the printing of the printed part at a small cost we could determine afterwards whether or not the enlarged and illustrated parts should be printed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I move to strike out the words "together with accompanying tables and illustrations."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to join very heartily in the wish expressed by my colleague that whatever may be done, whether the report be printed in whole or in part, it will not operate to delay the consideration of the water-power legislation now pending before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, would the Senator consent to letting this matter go over until to-morrow morning? We should like to have a short executive session.

Mr. THOMAS. I think we can get through very soon, in view of the motion made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we can finish in a very few minutes.

Mr. STONE. In a very few minutes it will be 5 o'clock and we will have to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question regarding his proposed amendment. If it is as I understand it to be, I shall not oppose a vote at once. I desire to ask the Senator whether his amendment is designed to exclude from the resolution the printing of the large mass of matter found in this book here?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I shall vote for it.

Mr. WALSH. I will withdraw that amendment, with the permission of the Senate, and substitute in lieu thereof the following: I move to strike out the words "together with accompanying tables and illustrations" and to insert in lieu thereof "without accompanying illustrations."

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that would destroy the value of the report. That is the only objection I have.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not mean to prevent the publication of this matter, but I think the wise thing to do is to submit another resolution to provide for the printing of the illustrations.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator desires to accomplish that, his amendment was in proper shape before. That can be accomplished by striking out the words just as he had them before and not using the word "without," because unless the resolution provides for printing the illustrations they will not be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Florida. How long would it take to print the reports that the Senator has there in that big book?

Mr. FLETCHER. The whole thing could be done in a month.

Mr. OVERMAN. By that time would not the water-power bills have passed?

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just saying that the report is submitted in three parts. If Senators come in after we get through with the discussion, we have to go all over it again. The report is in three parts—1, 2, and 3. Part 1 comprises the text, part 2 some other data and illustrations, and part 3 plans and maps. The text can be printed in 24 hours.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand. Then if the printing is deferred until those other reports can be printed, the report will be of no advantage to us, because we will have discussed the bill and passed it, probably; and then of what value to the Senate would be the expenditure of $13,000 to print these things?

Mr. VARDAMAN. It will cost $20,000 to print thirteen hundred of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it would cost $13,000—$7,000 for the text.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senate of the United States has passed a resolution calling for this report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some forty or fifty thousand dollars have been expended in collecting this data and making this report, and probably more. Now it is here. What is the use of having it if we are not going to print it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why spend $13,000 to print those documents when they will be of no advantage to the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. They will be of everlasting advantage to the Senate. The Senator will never see the day come when it will not be of advantage to have this information before the American people and before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to correct statements that have been made by Senators in this debate. They say that there was $50,000 spent in collecting the information in response to the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course I have no data on that point. It is merely an estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that that is not the case. I know that the greater part of the information was collected before ever the resolution was offered in the Senate. I have seen the tables. I have seen the illustrations. Most of them have been before the Public Lands Committee, not once, but twice that I know of. When the statement is made that the Government of the United States has spent $50,000 for the purpose of collecting information based upon the resolution under consideration, it is not true.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not quite like to have that sort of language used in reference to a statement that I have made in this Chamber. I never said that it was paid after this resolution was passed. I said that a resolution was passed that called for this report. I said that the collection of these data and material and the making of these surveys had cost something like forty or fifty thousand dollars. It may not have been all expended since the resolution was passed. The material may have been gathered years before; but however it was gathered, no matter when it was done, it cost something to do it; and it has cost the Government somehow, some time, in some way, an immense amount of money to get this material together. I have not the figures on it; but the Senator from Utah can not say to the Senate that this material has not cost the Government anything of any consequence——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah did not so state.

Mr. FLETCHER. Because it is utterly unreasonable to take that position.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I did not so state. Further than that, as to the statement the Senator now makes, that this information was collected before the resolution was introduced, and that it cost $50,000 to collect it, I have not a word to say against that. I believe that is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is just exactly my statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that the information that was collected by the department may have cost $50,000. That I do not know.

Mr. FLETCHER. Well, that is my statement. That is all I did say.

Mr. SMOOT. If the department says it cost $50,000, well and good, let it be that way. But it has been stated and restated, Mr. President, that because of a resolution of the Senate the Government went to the expense of $50,000 to collect the information, which of course is not the fact, as I have stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that I do not know anybody who has ever stated that. This is what the letter transmitting the report says:

> This report has been made up from data which has been accumulating for several years in the office of the Chief of Engineers, supplemented by investigations made in the field by district engineers of the Forest Service, and by correspondence with officials of power companies, to whom have been submitted for verification the greater part of the data on power development in 1915 as contained in this report.

The resolution was passed in 1915.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the resolution was passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. I should say at the last session of Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the close of the last session of Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. It was passed after the hearings on the water-power bill and the leasing bill were had before the Public Lands Committee. The Senator from Idaho introduced the resolution, and Mr. Merrill had the information and testified before the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. President, I do not want it understood that I object to printing any information that has not already been printed over and over again. I am perfectly willing to spend the money of the Government in printing everything that may be used in the consideration of the bills that are now upon the calendar or may be upon the calendar at this session of Congress. I may be wrong, and perhaps I am, in trying to save to the Treasury of the United States money that should not be wastefully spent. The great bulk of this, the great percentage of the report, can be found in Government documents to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Utah whether he does not regard this question of water power as one of the most important questions in the country, involving a resource that is of immense value in development, and whether he does not regard the diagrams of engineers explanatory of the legends in these reports as an aid, particularly to laymen, in reading these reports, and whether this expenditure is not trifling compared with the importance of the subject which is under consideration to-day, and probably will be under consideration for 20 years?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's question is a fair one, and I will say to the Senator that if it had not already been printed in——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand it has been printed in detached ways, a part here and a part there. A part of it has been presented to committes, but it never has been collated in any definite and comprehensive form, such as the form presented here.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know in how much more comprehensive form it could be printed than in three volumes recording the hearings before the Public Lands Committee, Sixty-third Congress, third session, on House bill 16673. The hearings began December 9, 1914.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean to say that there is not anything in this report that is not already available in some other report?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not say that. I said the great bulk of the information is available. But the Senator will say this: There is not one principle in the power bill or the leasing bill that will be discussed in this body that there have not been hearings upon, and they have been printed. The Senator will say another thing——

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator what that has to do with this resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will say another thing. If this material is printed, and the full expense of $21,000 incurred, it will not change one word in the bill as it will be ultimately passed by Congress. Another thing I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. How sure is the Senator of that? Does the Senator think there is not anyone here open to conviction? Have we all formed opinions that can not be changed by evidence, as the Senator evidently has done?

Mr. SMOOT. I say there is no information in the report that has not already been printed that would affect the mind of Senators in any way as to the wisdom of the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. How does the Senator know that? It would not change his mind, probably; but I venture to say that this information, which has been gathered according to our orders—and I should like to say that my information is that it has cost over $20,000—after the passage of the resolution——

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 5 o'clock). The Senate stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Thereupon the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m., Wednesday, February 2, 1916) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 3, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we realize profoundly the duality of our being, that deep in the secrets of the heart is the conflict twixt the evil and the good, the false and the true, the animal and the spiritual; each seeking supremacy. Deliver us, we beseech Thee, from the one and help us to make dominant the other, putting under our feet the evil, emphasizing the good, crushing the false, exalting the true, holding back the malevolent, putting forward the benevolent, eliminating selfish ambitions, rising ever to the spirit of altruism, that we may be worthy of the trust reposed in us and grow in favor with Thee, our fellow men, and feel the thrill of an approving conscience; and Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—CHILD-LABOR BILL.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the product of child labor, and for other purposes. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will take the Chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8234, the child-labor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment which was under consideration when the bill was last before the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend, on page 2, by striking out section 3, being from lines 17 to 23, inclusive, as follows:
> "SEC. 3. That the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall constitute a board to make and publish from time to time uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 3. That for the purpose of securing proper enforcement of this act the Secretary of Labor, or any person duly authorized by him, shall have authority to enter and inspect at any time mines, quarries, mills, canneries, workshops, factories, and manufacturing establishments and other places in which goods are produced or held for interstate commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall have authority to employ such assistance for the purposes of this act as may from time to time be authorized by law.

With the following committee amendments:

> Page 2, line 21, strike out the figure "3" and insert the figure "4."
> Line 25, page 2, after the word "factories," strike out the word "and."
> Page 3, line 3, after the word "by," strike out the words "appropriation or other."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "or," strike out the words "any person duly authorized by him" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Any United States marshal or deputy United States marshal."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire simply to state that I have listened to able arguments on both sides of the House in respect to economy. With those arguments I heartily agree, and I offer this amendment, believing that the United States marshals and deputy United States marshals throughout the country, without the employment of additional help, can see that this bill is fully enforced if it should be enacted into law. I seek to place this in the hands of the Attorney General, without any reflection upon the Secretary of Labor, because under the Attorney General's department, it strikes me, would come the enforcement of this law more than under the hands of the Secretary of Labor. I am satisfied that the Attorney General of this great country of ours will see that this law is fully enforced by the United States marshals and deputy United States marshals. I do not believe it is necessary to place upon the people the additional burden of employing additional men to travel from one end of this country to the other for the purpose of enforcing this bill should it become a law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. If this law is to be effective, experience has demonstrated that it is necessary to employ men specially to search out violations in order to have the law properly enforced.

Unfortunately, because of other duties, I was not present last Wednesday when the bill was under consideration. I am fully in sympathy with its purpose, and I hope it will be enacted. If it is to be enacted, it should contain such provisions as will enable the Government to make it effective. The only department of the Government that will have any keen interest in having this law effectively carried out is the Department of Labor. Under its organic act that department is charged with the enforcement of laws and for the ascertainment of the violation of laws similar to this proposed one. That department has special employees to enforce the naturalization laws and the immigration laws, and this particular act, which is designed to prevent young children, because of particular employment, being so affected that their after lives will be materially impaired, can only be effectively enforced by having employed under the Department of Labor persons selected particularly to enforce it. For these reasons I hope the amendment will not prevail, but that the department will be clothed with sufficient authority to make the law of some avail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line —, after the word "the," strike out all down to and including the word "act" and insert the following: "Attorney General shall pay said United States marshal or deputy United States marshal for services rendered for the purpose of enforcing this act such sum or sums as he may deem reasonable and as may from time to time be authorized by appropriation or other law."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I believed when I introduced this amendment that the law would be more effectively enforced than it would otherwise be, and at the same time save hundreds of thousands of dollars to the taxpayers of this country. The first amendment having been voted down, I can not see there is any need of passing this amendment; but I still believe marshals should be paid an additional sum in addition to the very small sum they are now paid, and we would get better service, and that this law would be more effectively enforced if this amendment were passed than otherwise.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose this amendment which would take from the Department of Labor the enforcement of the law and place it in the Department of Justice. Let me say to the gentleman from Florida and other gentlemen here that in my State of Rhode Island the United States marshal's office could not very properly enforce this proposed law for the reason that the force is now overworked and underpaid. The Department of Labor is peculiarly well fitted to enforce the law, and I think the committee has done well in naming that department of the Government for the work. I am glad I am here to-day to support this measure because I have nothing but the heartiest commendation for the people who are behind this kind of legislation, whether they are in this House or outside of it. It is legislation worth while, and as I listened to the debate last week I could not help but think it was a struggle between humanitarians and lawyers, and I am with the humanitarians and against the lawyers. That impression was somewhat enforced by looking at the table where the minority of the committee were entrenched behind a small law library, and it is further enforced by the consideration of the committee's report. The minority report looks like a brief addressed to a court to preserve and take care of some special interest.

The report of the majority looks like a combined effort of uplifters, humanitarians, and legislators to make the world better and bring a little sunshine into the lives of the children. Now, there is no question in the world that child labor is a national evil and a blot upon the fair name of our Republic. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the sentiment expressed in that sentence, and I want to say here that while I believe in industry, and I believe that every community should make every legitimate effort for the upbuilding of industry, I will say unreservedly I would rather see an industry wither and die than see it built up upon the child labor of this country. [Applause.] We have a very decent child-labor law in Rhode Island, and, of course, Rhode Island is a beehive of industry. I remember well when that law was up for consideration in the Rhode Island Legislature that I happened to be upon the committee on special legislation, and we had the usual objections interposed. There were men there representing different concerns, notably the department stores, saying that it would disorganize their business.

If I remember rightly, I said, "I hope it will if it will bring about social justice, and if it will bring about better conditions not only for the children but for the women employees." I remember distinctly, when I asked them how much of a wage they paid these children, they said about 50 cents a day. And when they kept them at night there was nothing provided in the way of food or comfort for the children.

Those department stores are still doing business; no disorganization has taken place, and the law is being enforced. And let me ask why uniform legislation should not govern the subject of child labor, whose work is transported from State to State? I believe that we should equalize conditions and put other States on an equal footing with Rhode Island. Let us be just to the manufacturers. Congress has the undoubted power to regulate interstate commerce, and no more beneficent exercise of that power could be indulged in than the helping in a generous way the children of our land, who will be our future citizens.

This bill is in line with the enlightened progress of the age; in line with advanced thought. I dislike to see and hear men falling back upon the Constitution of the United States when progressive legislation is urged in this body. I have more respect for the men who framed the Constitution of the United States than to take refuge in that instrument whenever we attempt progressive legislation. [Applause.] While it may be a fact that the property interests were better represented than the poor interests by the men who made the Constitution, still I do not believe that it was ever their thought to prohibit Congress from enacting legislation that would be of benefit to mankind in the suppression of child labor. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word or rise in opposition to the amendment, I do not care which. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Rhode Island that it is very unkind if he feels that he ought to deprive the opponents of this bill of the only possible objection that they can urge against its passage. There certainly would be nothing else that could be suggested that would give power to any man who desired to secure such desirable legislation. But, Mr. Chairman, I think that it may be said fairly that the lawyers are not by any means arrayed in opposition to this bill. Upon that proposition I desire to submit a few words in the consideration of this bill.

Each of the departments of government may have occasion to pass upon the constitutionality of a law. The legislative body which enacts the law must first determine whether or not the proposed measure conforms to the fundamental law. The Executive may be called upon to consider its constitutionality, and if he believes it unconstitutional veto it. The courts may be required to pass upon it when its constitutionality is challenged in a legal proceeding.

While the power of the courts to declare a law unconstitutional rests upon incontrovertible authority and is founded upon reason and necessity, it is evident that to declare the invalidity of a legislative act is the exercise of a very delicate and extraordinary power, and not to be exercised or justified except in cases requiring it. In determining the question every presumption should be in favor of the validity of the statute, and it should be declared invalid only when clearly and necessarily in contravention of the fundamental law. This is the announced and approved rule of all the Federal and State courts. It has been followed in an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States for more than a century. Thus in Fletcher against Peck it was held that the presumption is always in favor of the validity of a statute if the contrary is not clearly demonstrated; in the Dartmouth College case that in no doubtful case will a statute be pronounced unconstitutional; in the Sinking Fund cases that the presumption that an act of Congress is valid continues until the contrary is established beyond a reasonable doubt; and in Pine Grove Township against Talcott that a statute is not to be pronounced void upon the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution, unless such repugnancy be clear and the conclusion that it exists inevitable.

It is the duty of a court or a judge never to declare a statute unconstitutional unless it is so clearly, inevitably beyond any reasonable doubt. That is the rule not only because of the comity which should exist between coordinate branches of the Government, but also because constitutions are not intended as restraints or impediments to progress. Rather are they designed to aid the growth and development of the people. As new conditions arise new legislation is required, which is intended to benefit the people, to aid their progress, and lighten their burdens. It is to be presumed that legislative acts will help and not harm, will be beneficial and not injurious. Nothing should interfere with the exercise of that purpose except a clear violation of the people's will as expressed in their fundamental law. In the consideration of this bill the constitutionality of the proposed measure has been vigorously challenged, and Members have been told that if they have any doubt of the constitutionality of the contemplated legislation they should resolve that doubt against the measure and vote against it; that while it is the duty of courts to give every presumption in favor of the constitutionality of a law, Members of the House considering a bill should, if in doubt, resolve that doubt against the bill and vote against it. The reason given for this singular rule is that the courts considering the validity of legislative acts must assume that the legislative body has properly acted and only set aside its action on the clearest and most cogent reasons, while a legislature acting at first hand should never act when there is any doubt of its right to do so.

This course of reasoning is based upon what I consider an entirely false premise. No contemplated legislation which in the mind of the legislator is desirable should be prevented unless there is want of power to act or a restriction of the power to act contained in the fundamental law. Having determined the need of the legislation the legislator then considers whether there is any constitutional impediment. To refuse to enact a law which he has decided is necessary in the interest of the people because a doubt arises as to whether the Constitution might not interfere would bar the path of progress completely. Upon every ground of reason and sound sense the legislation ought to be enacted unless the constitutional bar to action is clearly shown. It could not be argued that reckless latitude should govern the legislative judgment.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. TOWNER. I do.

Mr. BRITT. I desire to ask the gentleman if it be true that the Supreme Court of the United States has held recently, as reported in Two hundred and thirty-eighth, that the digger of coal is not engaged in interstate commerce, coal being an innocent thing of itself and therefore not subject to control under the interstate provisions of the Constitution, how would the maker of a yard of cloth, which is an innocent thing of itself, be engaged in interstate commerce so as to let that product become a subject of interstate-commerce control?

Mr. TOWNER. I will be glad to answer that if I have the time.

The constitutional objection if urged should be fairly considered. But the legislator should be able to say, "I believe the legislation desirable, but the Constitution plainly forbids," before he opposes it on that ground. The constitutional obstacle should be definite and fairly certain in order to obstruct the course of legislation. To hold otherwise would be to block the path of progress. Constitutions were not made for that purpose. They are charters of liberty, rather than shackles of slavery. They are guideposts on the pathway of progress, rather than impediments and obstacles. Because that progress is orderly does not mean that it should be obstructed.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not take the time now, but I will yield if I can get the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Do not object.

Mr. KEATING. I am not going to object, but I am going to endeavor to get an agreement as to the time on this section.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman wait a little while? It is early in the afternoon. Give the gentlemen a chance to discuss the bill a little while, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KEATING. I do not want to unnecessarily limit debate, but I would like to get on with the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any difficulty about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. Constitutional restrictions are designed to prevent interference and injustice, not to impede the onward march of civilization. As the minds of men are widened by the years, as the spirit of humanity is strengthened by enlarged vision, new means of helping the weak, protecting the dependent, uplifting the lowly, lightening the burdens of the poor will come into view. It would be a strange perversion of constitutional government if the very instruments under which these blessings should be obtained most easily should be made insurmountable walls, forever barring progress.

I hope no Member of this House, convinced of the desirability of this legislation, will be deterred from supporting it merely because its ingenious and energetic opponents have suggested doubts as to its constitutionality. They certainly have fallen far short of any convincing showing that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution gives Congress power to regulate commerce among the States. If this bill regulates commerce among the States, all questions as to its constitutionality must disappear. It provides that the products of child labor shall not be transported in interstate commerce; that is, in commerce among the States. It is argued that the object of the bill is not to regulate commerce among the States, but to prevent child labor within the States. But upon what grounds is that assumption based? It does not in terms provide that child labor shall not be used by any mill or factory within the State. It does not provide that goods made by child labor shall not be sold or transported within the State. It does not attempt in any way to regulate commerce within the State. All that is left absolutely, without restriction, to the State. But if products made by child labor are offered for commerce among the States, that portion of commerce, the regulation of which is expressly committed to Congress, such traffic is prohibited. How, then, can it be argued that Congress exceeds its powers? It does not attempt to interfere with manufacture within the State; it does not attempt to regulate or prohibit commerce within the State. It is only when the makers of products produced by child labor seek to embark in commerce among the States that congressional regulation becomes operative. It is only within that field of operation which the Constitution expressly commits to Congress that this bill takes effect.

But it is argued that the ulterior purpose of the bill is to interfere with the police power of the States. Many times the Supreme Court has held that the ulterior effects of the operation of an act will not defeat its purpose if that purpose is within the constitutional power of Congress.

In a decision handed down January 10, 1916, interpreting the food and drugs act, Mr. Justice Hughes, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, considered the objection that the measure, although relating to articles transported in interstate commerce, was an encroachment on the reserved rights of the States. He said that the objection was not to be distinguished in substance from that which was overruled in sustaining the white-slave act. There it was stated that—> if the facility of interstate transportation can be denied in lotteries, obscene literature, diseased cattle and persons, and impure food and drugs, the like facility could be taken away from the systematic enticement of and enslavement in the prostitution and debauchery of women.

Justice Hughes then adds:

> The court concluded with the reassertion of the simple principle that Congress is not to be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority over interstate commerce and its power to adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, because those means may have the quality of police regulations.

Applying that reasoning to the present case, may it not fairly be said that Congress shall not be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority over interstate commerce because it may result in the exclusion of the products of a State which are produced by child labor? Neither will it be defeated in its endeavor to regulate commerce among the States in the interest of all the people of all the States merely because that regulation may run counter to the police laws of individual States. [Applause.]

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad, indeed, of the opportunity of saying a word in favor of this bill.

I was very much impressed the other day with the address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wherein he stated that in the arts of peace the time had come for this Government to put its house in order, that it might be sufficient unto itself if the evil days should come. I have been pleased at the opportunity of supporting measures that looked to the conservation of water power, of oil, and minerals; but, Mr. Chairman, the greatest asset possessed by this Nation is not water power, nor oil, nor minerals—the greatest asset possessed by this or any other nation is the youth of the land. [Applause.]

I was delighted at the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] that he was going to resolve all of his constitutional doubts in favor of the childhood of his State. I want to say, in fairness to him and the State that he represents, that the conditions disclosed by him with reference to children being forced into the factories by "drunken daddies" is not peculiar to the State of Georgia, but obtains in every State of this Union to a greater or less degree. And if the time is now here when the natural guardians of children will not protect them from labor of this character, then the time has come for this great Government to interfere in behalf of those children and supersede, in some measure, the authority that is being abused by their natural guardians.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. REAVIS. I must decline to yield; I have only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REAVIS. In conversation the other day I heard the statement made that in the environment in which many of these children live, with the limitation of their horizon, with the blood that was in them, there was not much hope for their future. Mr. Chairman, you and I, who judge superficially, have no right to pass judgment upon the future of a child. You and I, who see only externals, have no right to place limits on the souls of children. Down deep in the subconsciousness of the childhood of America lies embryonic greatness that requires only just legislation on the part of the Government to give it a chance to develop. If you and I had been walking the streets of St. Louis in the early fifties and had seen a short, heavy-set, silent man standing in the drizzle of an early fall evening by the side of his load of wood seeking a possible purchaser, as I have seen them in my home city times without number, we might have pitied him that he had no chance; and yet within the course of a very few years the crowned heads of Europe were doing homage to Ulysses S. Grant, the wood hauler of St. Louis. [Applause.] If you and I had been in the wilderness of Kentucky a hundred years ago and had seen a plain-faced, unkempt little lad studying his book by the brushwood fire, we would have pitied him because of his limited opportunity; and yet the time came when not only the people of the United States, but the people of the civilized world created of Abraham Lincoln their patron saint—the plain-faced, unkempt little boy who read by the brushwood fire. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, if you and I had walked the streets of Bethlehem some 2,000 years ago and had seen a brown-eyed, brown-haired little Lad following His father, the carpenter, we would have pitied Him. But the time came when the earth trembled, when the sun hid its face from the tragedy on the mountain, and to-day, after the passing of 2,000 years, the civilized world bows in adoration at the feet of the Christ, the brown-eyed, brown-haired little Lad who followed His father, the carpenter. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. The great need in America to-day is the development of individual character, and you can not develop character in the childhood of America by making them beasts of burden.

If I may be permitted the relation of an intimate incident that occurred in my district late last fall, I will say that by reason of being caught in a storm on the public highway and because my automobile insisted on parking itself in a ditch I was compelled to throw myself on the hospitality of a farmer for the night. And after supper was over—for we call it supper out there—and the supper dishes had been done away we repaired to the sitting room in that farm home. On one side of the stove the father was reading his paper, and on the other side the mother was doing her sewing as she talked to me. As we sat there three white-clad little figures came quietly into that room and knelt by their mother's knee and recited the prayer that has been the litany of this race for more than a hundred years:

Now I lay me down to sleep.

In the eyes of the mother was a holy look. The father, through half-closed lids, seemed to be seeing in the distant future a vision of his little boys and girls, grown to be men and women, doing their part in the work of the world, performing the duties of citizenship. I walked to the window and looked out on the quiet country night and saw the stars swing out through the broken clouds of a dying storm. I heard the patter of baby feet up the stairway, with the mother following in their wake, and the thought came to me, Mr. Chairman, and the thought is with me now, that the strength of this Nation lies not in the vulgar noise and turmoil of your great cities; the strength of this Nation is not in the lights and music and fair faces of State receptions; the strength of this Nation is not in a mighty Navy nor a far-flung battle line. The strength of this Nation, its promise of to-day, its fulfillment of to-morrow, lies in the teachings that are being given to the youth of the land in the Christian homes of America. [Applause.]

I would take the children from the factories and the mines and put them in the schools where they belong that they may be equipped for the future. I would take these children from the mines and the factories and place them upon the playgrounds where bent and wasted bodies may be restored to health and strength. I would have this Government, through this Congress, say to the man of greed and avarice, whoever he may be, wherever he may be, "No more, no more, except you choose to become a criminal under the laws of your Nation, shall you be permitted to coin dollars from the fair white body of a child." [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my approval of the purpose of this bill. I have listened with marked attention to the discussion of the Members here upon the floor of the House; and I have failed yet to find a single Member who has risen and said that he was not in favor of prohibiting child labor under certain restrictions. This being true, now is the time to vote as you speak.

It seems to me that the purpose of this bill is best for the child, it is best for the Nation, and it is best for the State, for in the welfare of our children do we find the welfare of our Nation. And it occurs to me this bill is based not only upon the health of the children, but as well I can not see how a little child of immature years can stay in a cotton mill, with the windows closed, breathing the atmosphere that is filled with lint, and such labor not be derogatory to the child's health.

We are confronted here with the idea on the part of some Members that this is an attack against an industry of their States. A great majority of the States of our country have legislation similar to the legislation contained in this bill; and may I say that under this bill any State can manufacture goods with child labor or female labor if they wish, but if they do manufacture goods with such labor they should keep that product in their own State and out of a State that forbids the employment of child labor in the manufacture of goods produced therein. I herewith incorporate in my remarks the provision of the bill referring to child labor:

Be it enacted, etc., That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years who work more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.

This legislation is opposed on account of contravening the Constitution, but I think, Mr. Chairman, that the court, when it comes to that question, will decide in favor of the welfare of the child under the clause to provide for the general welfare of the people. But the Constitution specifically provides that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce between the States. The right of Congress to make this legislation is full and ample. The bill will not affect my State, as we have similar laws.

Some seem to think it is an attack on the rights and prerogatives of their States. I am inclined to think they are wrong. Twenty-seven States have laws prohibiting children under 14 years to work in factories or mines, and it is not plain to me why any outside State should ship goods into a State that prohibits the manufacture of goods by such labor within the State itself. Michigan is one of the States that prohibits a child under 14 years from working in its mines or factories. Why should it prohibit such children from working in its mines or factories if it permitted goods made in other States by children within such age to come in and be sold in its markets? I think the uniform law provided in this bill will tend to make better relations between all the States—North, South, East, and West. And, Mr. Chairman, during immature years, when the child should be fitting itself for the great work of citizenship of this Republic, there is a place far superior to the mine and the factory for those of tender years. For those reasons and others I am in favor of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes it unlawful for the producer or dealer to make interstate shipment of products produced in whole or in part by child labor. Under its terms, first, children under the age of 16 years are prohibited from working in mines and quarries; second, children under 14 years of age are prohibited from working in mills, canneries, workshops, factories, or manufacturing establishments; third, children between 14 and 16 years of age can not be employed more than eight hours per day; fourth, children under 16 years of age can not be employed at night.

The bill seeks to outlaw products made in violation of the act from interstate shipment. The Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor constitute a board to provide uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act. Authority is granted to the Secretary of Labor, or any person duly authorized by him, to enter and inspect, at any time, mines, quarries, mills, workshops, factories, manufacturing establishments, and other places where goods intended for interstate shipment are being manufactured by child labor. It further provides that no dealer shall be subject to a conviction who shall establish a guaranty, issued by the manufacturing establishment, to the effect that the act had not been violated by the employment of child labor.

Fifteen years ago the policy of most of the States permitted children over 11 years of age to be employed in the factories. There was then scarcely any system of inspection in any of the States. Night work was everywhere permitted. Many States had no laws at all protecting the child in the factory.

The 1900 census contained the startling data that 30 per cent of those that labored in the cotton mills of the South were under 16 years of age. Also, that many children were working in the factories at the age of 6 years. Great changes have taken place for the betterment of conditions of children working in factories since that date. Nearly every State has now some kind of child-labor law.

Public sentiment exists everywhere favoring better conditions for children working in the factories. Only a few years ago one State refused to pass a law for the protection of the children. The law being placed before the electorate on the initiative was passed by a vote of 75,000 to 25,000.

Even where commendable laws were passed it is shown in the hearings that such laws were generally violated, and in some instances the legislatures have lowered the age limit from 14 to 12 years.

It was also developed that many of the factories had lobbyists working against such measures; that 86 per cent of the population of the United States by States has now adopted a 14-year age limit; that 85 per cent of the population of the States have legislation that prohibits children under 16 years of age from doing night work, while 50.6 per cent of the population of the States are committed to the standard of eight hours per day for children who work in the factories. It also appears that eight-hour-per-day laws are but feebly and poorly enforced.

The Census Bureau in 1900, at a time when South Carolina had no child-labor law, gave the following figures for two counties having factories in that State, showing the number of children employed in factories and the number attending school, viz:

Age.	In school.	Employed.
9 to 9 years	251	147
10 years	79	351
11 years	50	391

After the 12-year age limit went upon the statutes the majority of the children under 12 years were found in school; but when the age limit was reached the children graduated from the school to the factory, there to labor under the most unfavorable conditions, affecting health and physical and moral development.

It is estimated that in this State about 1,500 children under the age of 12 years were employed in the cotton mills. It is also said that 50 per cent of the factory children were illiterate, and that the death rate of the operatives and the nonoperatives was greatly in favor of the latter.

On March 28, 1914, a canning factory in Maryland had in its employ 37 children ranging from 4 to 14 years of age. Who can doubt the fact that these children would be wonderfully benefited by the passage of this act.

It must be remembered that the children who are forced into the factories have no chance for education, no opportunity to equip themselves for the struggles of life. The system brings down the wages of the men. The adult wage is largely measured by the child's wage.

This widespread evil should be wiped out and every child should be given an education and fitted for the duties of citizenship. It becomes the duty of a great nation to protect the children from exploitation, that they may have a fair and equal opportunity for development. If the child must be placed under stress and crushing conditions that cause physical, mental, and moral decay, so must the nation to that extent be injured. The Government must ultimately rest upon the shoulders, hearts, and consciences of the coming generation.

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Much has been said against the constitutionality of the proposed bill. Under the early decisions of the United States Supreme Court this bill probably would have been declared unconstitutional. Our court in recent years has been giving a broad meaning to the interstate-commerce clause of our Constitution in so far as public health, public morals, and the welfare of the people are concerned.

Many cases are cited to show that production is complete before commerce begins; that there is no connection between production of merchandise and commerce of the same; and that the article is not a part of interstate commerce until it is on its journey to another State.

Section 8, Article I, of the Constitution provides:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

The power granted is direct, without limitations or exceptions. Congress may regulate commerce among the States for the purpose of promoting public health, public morals, and general welfare of the people.

The Congress may adopt any means to put into force and effect the power granted them by the States, even if such legislation may to some extent constitute a police regulation within the State in so far as it may affect commerce. The very object of vesting this power in Congress was to create uniformity in the regulation of commerce between States so that one State could not adopt and maintain a policy offensive to the morals of the people of another State.

Under the provision Congress can deny to the citizens of one State the right to use the channels of commerce into other States when their methods in competition or in the production of the article of commerce are unfair and unjust to the people of the other States.

Many States have passed humane laws affecting child labor. Some have passed laws in a limited way while others have no laws at all. Certainly Congress should have the power to deny the citizens of one State the right to traffic in interstate commerce goods when they have adopted false and inhuman policies inimical to the health, morals, or welfare of the people.

The right exists to protect the people from unfair discrimination, from unlawful combination in restraint of trade; and in order to reach the evil Congress denies the offending operator the right to interstate transportation.

Child labor in the factories is offensive because articles are produced under conditions that shock the conscience, under conditions that are crushing the lives and injuring the health of the children.

No one should be permitted to pursue evil practices as a matter of right. Because of such fact Congress has the undoubted right to overthrow a bad system that is crushing out the health and lives of the children.

The Lottery Ticket case fully sustained the provisions of this bill. In that case it was said, in effect, that the State may for the purpose of guarding the morals of its people forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits. So Congress, for the purpose of guarding all the people of the United States against this widespread pestilence and for the purpose of protecting its commerce, may prohibit the carrying of tickets from one State to another.

This decision was not made on the ground that the Government should protect the buyer of the ticket, but on the broad ground that it violated the morals and public welfare, not the individual morals, but the public morals.

If the State may take knowledge of the widespread evil of child labor, then why may not Congress as to interstate-commerce matters do so? If it is wrong in the States, why is it not wrong in the commerce between States? If it is right to prohibit child labor in one State, why should it not be prohibited in all the States? If the wrong should be driven out by the legislative power of a State, why should it be permitted to take refuge in another State?

The interstate-commerce clause allows Congress to strike at the evil in all the States by denying the product of this system the right to be sent in interstate commerce. The court sustained the lottery act because the institution was offending the morals of the people. It sustained the Mann White-Slave Act, which took away the facilities of interstate transportation from those engaged in prostituting and debauching women and girls.

Obscene literature offends the morals. The fear of contagion from diseased cattle offends public health. Impure foods and drugs are injurious to health. Misbranding of goods perpetrates a fraud. Antitrust laws have been sustained on the ground that the offending combinations should not be allowed to use interstate-commerce channels because they were engaged in a wrong. All of these have been declared to be offensive to commerce between States, and Congress has entered upon the duty of keeping the channels of transportation pure and free from these evils which affect health, morals, and public welfare.

Why, then, should goods manufactured under conditions that deprive children of health and education, under conditions that shocks the conscience of the Nation, be allowed to pollute the free channels of interstate commerce? [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB rose.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has agreed to recognize the gentleman's colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair should recognize my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no gentleman on this floor in my earnest and sincere advocacy of all just and proper laws for the protection of tender childhood. But, gentlemen, I ask that that authority be exercised by the powers to which it is delegated under the Constitution of our country.

Can it be that gentlemen here believe that this Congress has the power to pass a law which will permit what is provided for in section 2 of this bill? Under its provisions if a negro boy, a water carrier, carries water to the employees who make the products of the factory one time and one time only, he being under the age of 14 years and within the provisions of this bill, then the entire product of that factory for 60 days, although it may be $1,000,000 worth of its products, can be boycotted and obstructed and its removal prevented under the provisions of this act.

Is there anybody here who believes that the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution, has the power thus to invade the reserved powers of the States and control the production and removal of an article absolutely innocent in itself? Why, my distinguished friend from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] says that we have the power to prevent immoral women from being transported from one State into another State. Of course we have, because they are injurious to the morals of that State. He says also that we have the power to prevent impure drugs and food from being transported from one State to another. Certainly we have, because they offend the health and decency of that State. But I ask any gentleman on this floor to name in all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States a single case where it has been held that an article, absolutely innocent in itself, not offending in the place where it is proposed to ship it, not hurting its morals, not hurting its people, has ever been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be subject to control by this Congress under the interstate provision of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITT. Certainly.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman how does he distinguish the cases where the courts hold that they have a right to prohibit combinations from exercising the right to transport their goods in interstate commerce?

Mr. BRITT. I shall be glad to answer that. It comes under and applies to an entirely different provision of law, under an entirely different principle of public policy, where there are combinations against the public interest, and is not in line with the making of an innocent article. But in this case your bill is directed against the production of a clean, harmless, healthy, and moral article, and you propose to go into the heart of a State and take the power of that State and transfer it to this Congress. Republican as I am, Hamiltonian as I am, I can not approve it. It would make Alexander Hamilton turn over in his grave to think of the exercise of such power by the Federal authority. I favor all just, necessary, and proper laws for the regulation of child labor. I do not want the innocent child worked too long; I want him in school; I want his little limbs, body, mind, and soul conserved and protected; but I want it done by the only authority that knows how to do it.

Take my State, for instance. In one place it is wood manufactures; in another it is cotton goods; in another it is wooden novelties; in others it is pottery; in others it is the thousand and one little things that we make; all of them perfectly innocent and harmless in themselves. You make no distinction; you abolish child labor of any sort, even where it would be a pleasure for the child to get to work. You propose one blanket law for North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, and every other State, and you do not attempt a defense of its constitutionality; you virtually admit that you have no authority to do it; but you want to make those States that have not yet made laws in harmony with your views enact them anyway, whether they meet local conditions or not. True, we have not yet done all we should do. We have not yet done all we should do in North Carolina, but we are advancing. This movement is an evolution. We are rising to the situation. Our vision is being clarified. Leave us to ourselves. It is our problem. We are equal to it. To protect our children is our right; it is our duty. This Congress has neither the power nor the duty. We have both. Leave us to our appointed task.

Gentlemen, I am in favor of protecting the child. All my life long I have been his friend, and I shall always be; but I also respect those rights that have been reserved by the Constitution to the several States of this Union, and so long as I am a Member of this Congress I shall, under my oath, give my vote for the protection of those rights. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I noticed the enthusiasm of my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for this bill. I fear there is a good deal of false sentiment that has been created by a well organized and financed child-labor committee, and I fear that many Members are going to vote according to that sentiment. I do not like to have a man attempt to pluck the beam out of my eye until he gets the mote out of his own. I do not like to have the gentleman from New York commend the provisions of this unusual revolutionary measure, because he thinks probably that it will hit somebody else, until he cleans around his own door. I want to read just a few extracts from a recent report by Mrs. Nathan, head of the Consumers' League in New York, and I want to say that these things which she relates are taking place right under the very noses of the National Child-labor committee, backers of this bill, with its head offices at 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York. And I want to say before I read this that I defy any man, North, South, East, or West, to find anything remotely approaching such horrible conditions in North Carolina or in any one of the four States that seem to be under attack.

MRS. NATHAN FINDS BABIES WAGE SLAVES—CONSUMERS' LEAGUE HEAD TELLS OF ABUSES IN ARTIFICIAL-FLOWER INDUSTRY FOUND IN YEAR OF INQUIRY—CHILD OF 4 WORKS 14 HOURS A DAY IN TENEMENT—WOMAN TOILS FROM 6 A. M. UNTIL MIDNIGHT.

Shocking details of child slavery in this city were unfolded yesterday by Mrs. Frederick Nathan, president of the Consumers' League.

Her story, the result of a year's investigation by the league, was told in the Harris Theater before a large audience. She related instances of long hours in dingy tenement rooms for a few cents, which lead in every case to the sanitarium and then the grave.

Mrs. Nathan's report follows:

"The most important investigation made by the Consumers' League in the last year was a comprehensive study of the artificial-flower trade in tenement homes.

"The labor law of New York State says: 'No child under the age of 14 years shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in or in connection with any factory in this State.' Yet in many families everyone, even down to the tiniest children, was found at work.

"In one home on a Saturday morning, four children of 10, 9, 6, and 4 years were found sitting by a table near the one window, making cherries. They had been there since 6 o'clock, and worked each day until 8 o'clock.

"No child above 4 or 5 is considered too young to work. Six-year-old boys and girls were found separating petals or pasting leaves on stems. One baby of 2½ years was found seated in a high chair, by his mother's side, pulling apart the petals which had been sent from the factory packed between gauze which must be separated from the petals.

"Another woman worked from early in the morning until 10, 11, and 12, and sometimes 1 and 2 o'clock at night. She had no children, and her husband, who was out of employment, did her housework in order that she might devote all her time to the work."

Now, there are a great many of these idle-rich, sentimental, good-hearted women who help out the child-labor committee agitation who want to press this bill through Congress, who next Sunday will probably wear upon their beautiful hats flowers made by the children slaves there in New York City.

To work long hours in a factory—

Says Mrs. Nathan in her report—

To work long hours in a factory surrounded by the whir of machines and the confusion of many workers has its decided disadvantages, but when long hours are combined with work in these crowded, cluttered, often ill-smelling and dirty homes, almost any factory would be preferable.

Family after family was found where one or more of the members had "a cough and was going away to get well," where children had died of "a bad cold," or the father had been in bed for six weeks with "throat trouble." The toll of tuberculosis in these dark and unhealthy tenements is very great.

One woman was found whose three oldest children had died of the dread disease within nine years in the same house where she and her 11-year-old girl were then at work on flowers. One of her daughters was even then at the State sanitarium, and the little girl was soon to be sent away to "get over her cold."

CONTAGION INEVITABLE RESULT.

In one tenement a scarlet-fever sign adorned an open door and children from other homes were running in and out.

If goods are made in homes where dirt and filth are prevalent, or, worse still, where disease is so often found, contagion is the inevitable result. Case after case has been found where disease germs have been carried from the filthy tenements to the homes of the buyers of these tenement-made goods.

The danger to the consumer is great, to society perhaps even greater. The stunted, anaemic children whom we see in almost every tenement home can not but grow up into stunted, anaemic adults.

The price paid for the work is so excessively low that the possibility of living on it is out of the question. Prices vary from 2 cents a gross for pasting leaves on stems to $1.40 a gross for making flower wreaths.

FAMILIES GET 60 CENTS A DAY.

One family was found in which three women working on flowers made together $4.30 every 15 days. They made forget-me-not wreaths and received 7 cents for one dozen wreaths. Families were found whose combined earnings were only 60 cents a day.

If, therefore, we wish to prevent child labor, to conserve the health of the dwellers in tenements, to protect the consumer from the danger of contagion, and to safeguard society, we must stand for the absolute prohibition of tenment-home manufacturing.

I commend that severe arraignment of the conditions in the tenement houses to my friend from New York and to the National Child Labor Committee, and I defy him and them to point to a factory in the entire South where such horrible conditions have ever prevailed or ever can prevail.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman think the passage of this bill would help to cure the conditions he has just recited?

Mr. WEBB. Not a particle. Tenement-house work is not included in this bill. If I offered an amendment to strike at these tenement hell holes, this House would vote it down, as they did some similar amendments. I offered an amendment touching the white-slave traffic in Chicago, and the House voted it down without even giving it consideration. You can not put an amendment on this bill that would strike the horrible tenement holes where men, women, and little children are dying of tuberculosis and scarlet fever. If you can, why do you not strike them? There is a very fertile field in New York City, and there are others in Boston and other big cities where the evils are far more terrible than in the sanitary and well-conducted cotton mills throughout the South. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I was much impressed by the splendid tribute of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] to the boys whom he named here, who performed such great services as boys and as men for their homes and for this Nation; but it seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has overlooked one little feature that should have had his attention in paying that tribute to these boys, and that was the fact that these boys, raised by poor mothers, were taught as boys the necessity for contributing to the support of the family. [Applause.] He has picked out boys who have made their names illustrious in the history of this country, but he has overlooked the fact that he has not named a single boy who did not have to work as a boy. It does not detract from their greatness that these poor boys made their own way; why does not the gentleman devote himself to the proposition that it has not retarded the development of these boys in any way, but has made them men sooner, in that they learned as boys to take care of themselves. And, Mr. Chairman, he has overlooked absolutely the call of the mother in this instance. When he pays his tribute to childhood, I say to him that if he would go through all the world and take all the languages he can find, and pick out the one word that stands higher than any other in the estimation of American manhood, it is the name of mother; and where you find a widowed mother in want, unable to support herself, I ask the gentleman is he doing right and justice to take these boys and these young women who are capable of earning their living, working in warm climates where the windows are open and where they can toil in safety to themselves, is he doing right to throw them out of honest employment and offer them all the temptations of vice without offering them any other honest livelihood? What positions do you offer them? What opportunities for education do you give them? What advantages do you propose to offer them? Absolutely nothing. You throw the restrictive arm of this Government between them and opportunity. You leave wide open the ports of entry from all the world, and you bring to this country the products of child labor from every country in the world and sell them in my home State and in all the States of this Union without any restriction whatever. The fact that these products are made in hell holes, that they are made by children under 10 years of age—all of these conditions are known to you, but not one single thing do you do to protect American labor against child labor abroad. You take your sweatshops located in New York and Massachusetts, and other States, and produce articles there by child labor, and send them where you will. You also take the raw products from every State in the Union, grown, raised, and produced by child labor, and you bring them from one State to another and put them in your factories and manufacture them as you will, and do you try to keep them out? No, you do not. Arrogating great virtues to yourselves, you lay an inhibition on commerce, you restrict us and injure us for your own selfish purposes, being unwilling to go far enough to do anything for a result that injures you to any degree.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, in the recent discussion of the child-labor bill the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] made some remarks which, it seems to me, deserve attention, especially his brief summary relative to the production of cotton and knit goods at home and abroad. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, he pointed to the fact that 525,000 women and girls and 66,000 men and boys were engaged in the manufacture of these textiles in Japan alone. He also showed that these workers were paid from 8 to 15 cents per day, and viewed with much alarm the competition the Far East is building up against American manufacturers.

While I can, in the main, corroborate by personal observation his statement as to these conditions in Japan and China, I can see no immediate cause for distress as to direct competition from that source in this country, unless the European war reaches an early termination. None of these articles are being exported to America to-day, and in 1917 I am certain a Republican President and a Republican Congress will see to it that all danger of unfair competition in foreign, cheap-labor-made textiles is promptly subdued. [Applause on the Republican side.]

No, Mr. Chairman; the competition of Japan and China in the cotton and knit goods industries does not so much concern the northern manufacturer at this time as do the conditions in our own country, which this bill will seek to terminate, if enacted.

In my mind, I might say in passing that I might not agree with all the provisions of this bill. I might be willing to agree that children in States without compulsory educational law were in less danger at early ages if engaged in some light employment rather than to become exposed to the dangers and temptations of idleness and perfect freedom of their desires and fancies. Suitable employment is not always a dangerous element in the life of a boy or girl, and brings sometimes experiences which are valuable in their after years; but to conserve their abilities by education and enlightening surroundings and environment is far better, in the last analysis, if this element of improvement and good citizenship is at hand and properly employed.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman told us that in his district there are 2 cotton plants and 15 knitting mills, in which the wages range from 50 to 60 cents per day for beginners and from $1 to $1.50 per day for skilled workers. In my own district there are more than 100 of these industries. There the lowest wage is $1 per day, and the highest for skilled labor is upward of $3.50 per day, with an average wage of about $1.75 per day. We have a child-labor law which provides for a minimum age of 14 to 16 years; we have compulsory education laws; we have workmen's compensation laws, which not only guard and protect the family of every worker, but which have inculcated and emphasized that wonderful principle of "safety first" among both employers and employees. All of these enactments have made gratifying changes in working conditions and have assisted potently in cementing a friendship between the workers and their employers which was not dreamed of when the laws cited were placed in operation.

Here, then, is the competition which is feared and must be met. The argument of the gentleman from Tennessee relative to the situation in Japan returns with far more force to the situation at home. His own statement proves that by reason of freedom in the matter of child labor his mills are turning out their product at about 100 per cent lower labor costs than are we of New York. He is located in the center of the production of the raw material, while we pay liberally for its transportation to our far-away industries.

Therefore, is it a source of wonderment that we of New York favor the enactment of this law? Is it a source of wonderment why some of our southern friends and neighbors oppose it? Their business interests will not suffer so greatly as they appear to fear should this measure become law, and they will enjoy the benefit of their enviable location.

The northern manufacturers, too, will be better contented to know that the present so-called unfair competition in their own country has been largely done away with, and that the southern manufacturers, on the plane of labor cost at least, have no advantage over them. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I think it is an unfair assumption on the part of some of the advocates of this bill that those who are opposed to it favor child labor. I know that, so far as I am concerned, I am opposed to this bill, but in the only speech I ever made on the subject in my own State I advocated the enactment by the Legislature of South Carolina of a law prohibiting absolutely the employment of children under the age of 14 years. According to the majority report there are but four States in the Union in which this standard provision does not prevail, so that it is boiled down to a question here whether the Congress will force those four States now to adopt the 14-year provision or whether it will allow those States to progress gradually toward the adoption of that 14-year age limit.

Now, I know that in the majority report they have quoted with approval of the committee the statement of Miss Florence Kelley that in South Carolina after the enactment of the 60-hour-a-week law the legislature evidently decided that it was too liberal, and increased the period of work from 60 to 66 hours a week. I have no doubt that that good lady was sincere in that statement; but the fact is it is untrue, for the age limit has not been increased; and the history of this legislation in all the States of the Union will show that there has been a gradual progress toward the adoption of stricter laws for the protection of children.

In the State of South Carolina that has been true. It was but a few years ago when there was no labor law for the protection of children, but gradually they have adopted laws prohibiting night work, prohibiting the work of children under 12, and allowing the work of children between 12 and 14 years of age only where permit is secured from the State for their employment. Under that provision, according to the report of the secretary of labor of South Carolina, which I hold in my hand and which with permission I will put in the RECORD, there has been a gradual tendency away from the employment of children. Every year there has been a reduction in the number of children employed in the textile industries in South Carolina. So I contend that, if left to the States, the States themselves will correct what you believe to be a national evil.

My good friend from Georgia, Mr. HOWARD, referred to the fact that Georgia has adopted a child-labor law. It was only a few years ago that I heard on this floor Members criticizing the State of Georgia for not adopting a child-labor law. Now they have one, and he tells us that progress is being made. In South Carolina that is true also. Now, why should Congress attempt to enforce its ideas of what a standard provision should be, without having knowledge of the local conditions, instead of allowing these people to pursue their progress toward a standard law? You may say, "If what you say is true, what objection have you to this bill?" I have this objection: My people believe in local self-government; they believe that that legislation is best which is founded upon accurate information, and that accurate information can be secured only by those who are familiar with the local conditions. I may say that the Legislature of South Carolina is now in session, and a bill has been introduced to raise the limit to 14 years, and there is a good chance of its being adopted; but even if it is not adopted, I contend that it is better to leave the matter of regulation to the several States rather than have Congress force them to adopt the provisions of this bill whether they want to or not.

The report of the commissioner of agriculture and industries for the State of South Carolina for the year 1915 contains the following reference to the child-labor situation:

> The child-labor situation in June was still continuing to lead away from the employment of the young child, even though those between the ages of 12 and 14 years of age are allowed under the law to work. At that time, as compared to last year, there were 219 more white boys and 263 more white girls between the ages of 14 and 16 years in the mills than there were the year before. Between the same ages the negro males decreased by 23 and the negro girls by 6. There were 223 less white boys between the ages of 12 and 14 in the mills this year than last year and 116 less white girls between the same ages than last year, and there were 20 less negro boys and 5 less negro girls between the ages of 12 to 14 than at the same time last year.
> Summarizing the child-labor situation, the increase in children were all white children between the ages of 14 to 16, totaling 482 in number. The decreases were in children between the ages of 12 to 14. Of these, 339 were white children and 25 colored children, and then there were 29 colored children less between the ages of 14 to 16. The total decrease, therefore, in child labor amounted to 393, of which 339 were white children between the ages of 12 and 14. There were in June, therefore, only 7,425 children under the age of 16 employed in the textiles of the State of South Carolina, and of these 4,582 were above the age of 14 years, leaving only 2,843 between 12 and 14 working under permits granted by the State under the law. Most of these latter number were rapidly approaching the age of 14. Just one year before there were 4,100 white children between the age of 14 to 16 and 3,182 between 12 to 14.
> It is easy to see from the figures given above that there was during the first six months of 1915 a rapid drift away from the employment of the child that is under the age of 14 years. Considering the industrial situation in the State as a whole, nothing could be more gratifying than this very fact.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for eight minutes in stead of five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for eight minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, having read the opinion of our Supreme Court in the Lottery case, in One hundred and eighty-eighth United States, I have no doubt whatever about the constitutionality of this measure. The question of constitutionality, then. being out of the way, the only other question is whether this Congress shall exercise its power for the protection of innocent children by passing this act. I believe it should, and I believe that if we pass this bill the power of Congress will have never been used for a higher, nobler, or better purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any child under 14 years of age, or even under 16 years of age, should be permitted to work in mines, quarries, workshops, or factories, and I believe that it is the imperative duty of Congress to use all its powers to prevent this inhuman system of child labor in whatever parts of our country it may now be permitted.

There are but two reasons for child labor. One is that children can be employed cheaper than adults and thereby their employers can make more profits out of the particular business in which they are employed. The other reason is that inhuman parents are willing to put their little, innocent, helpless children into slavery in order to avoid working themselves. This fight, therefore, is a fight of helplessness and innocence on the one side against inhumanity and greed on the other. We have long since made the slaves free. We are fast freeing the women from conditions that are degrading to sex and motherhood and womanly development. Surely, it is time that we were breaking the shackles of slavery from the young children of our land. The very life of the Nation is dependent upon the mental and physical vigor and the unhampered development of the children of the Nation. This physical and mental vigor can not be had if they are permitted or forced to work long hours in mines, quarries, factories, or workshops. I am told that there are more than 2,000,000 of children in this country under 14 years of age slaving and toiling their young lives away in these institutions in order to bring greater ease and comfort to inhuman parents and in order to satisfy the greed of inhuman masters. In my view life is more important than property, and surely innocent, young life, just budding, blooming, and quickening life, is the most important of all life, and, in my judgment, it is our solemn duty, and it ought to be our highest privilege, to protect and defend this kind of life with all the power of our great Government. [Applause.]

Again, Mr. Chairman, the greatest adornment of life is education. The one main chance to get an education is in youth. If it is not well under way by the time the child is 14 years old it is rarely ever obtained. Oh, my colleagues, what right have we to permit others to take away from these young children that one chance to lift themselves to higher and better things?

You gentlemen who are fighting this bill, whether on constitutional grounds or whatever grounds, think well before you cast your votes against the little children. I know you are high-minded men. I know you are strong men. I know you are patriotic men. I know you are sincere and honest men. But do not let your well-trained minds dry up the generous impulses of your hearts, and I urge you to think long and soberly before you vote to shut the door of hope to these 2,000,000 young children and to the countless millions more who are to come after them. I doubt if there is a man among you whose sweetest memory is not that of standing at your mother's knee in the long ago, looking at the picture of Christ blessing the little children and hearing your sweet mother read from the great Book of Books, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

When you vote against this bill you vote against the teachings of that blessed book; you vote against the teachings of that Divine Saviour; you vote against the highest aspirations and the tenderest love of every true mother; you vote to make the children old before their time; you vote to prevent them from learning to read at their mothers' knee; you vote to make them too tired to stand and listen to the teachings of Holy Writ; you vote to take away from them their God-given right of mental and physical development; you vote to force them to lay their sweet, innocent young lives as a helpless sacrifice upon the cruel altar of inhumanity and greed. I beg you not to do it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] a few moments ago alluded to his friends from New York who are going to vote for this bill without taking either the beam or the mote from their eyes, I forget which, or both. The gentleman from North Carolina always tries to be accurate, and this time is no exception. This time he fell into error, and that is unusual. The language that he cited was, as I recall it, absolutely accurate. That report was made by the distinguished, charitable, generous, and useful lady whose name he mentioned. Twenty-five years ago, about, the State of New York passed a statute to regulate the very evil to which that report alludes, and our court of appeals, in the case of In re Jacobs, declared that statute unconstitutional by a vote of four to three. Thereafter the Consumers' League was formed. To do what? To supplement the statute and to stamp out the evils of home work in the homes in the metropolis, and it has been meeting each year with a greater and greater measure of success. More than that—and I say all this for the information of my friend from North Carolina, who would himself have stated it had he known it—within the last year, as any lawyer from New York could have told him, had he inquired, the highest court has modified the case of In re Jacobs so that now for the first time in a quarter of a century we are permitted to regulate that evil. The language that the gentleman read from the report of Mrs. Nathan was correct, but the report was submitted some time since. Since that report the legal conditions have changed so that we can fight that evil, and to-day in the city of New York if children such as he describes should attempt to do the work to which he referred in a tenement house in the city of New York the persons responsible for the work would be arrested and convicted. Knowing my friend's generous disposition and his fairness in argument, I thought that he would like to know that the citation that he made to the House was already a condition which fortunately has passed, and that now, at least, in the city of New York we can and are rooting out the very evils to which he so graphically called the attention of this House.

Most of us from New York City are going to vote for this child-labor bill because we think it is right. We have a similar law, somewhat more drastic, on the statute books of New York, and we are for this; and further than that, there are men who are Members of this House who are owners and operators of factories in the city of New York that have for themselves in their own factories established, and are maintaining, requirements that are higher not only than those required under this statute but higher than those under the statute of the State of New York, based on the higher law of all, the law of equality and justice and common humanity. I shall not name those men, although they are Members of this House and sitting on this floor. I want my friend from North Carolina to know these things about the great city which in part I have the honor to represent. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, on last Wednesday, a few moments before the adjournment of the House, I was very unjustly criticized by my good friend from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE], and also my good friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], for what they claimed to be an intended reflection on the State of South Carolina. I merely alluded to the Carolinas by way of comparison, as the record of what I said will show. I did not intend to say anything harsh, I did not intend to point out any specific instance, but my friend from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] saw fit to hold my great State up in ridicule without the least justification in comparison with his own State of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, old Georgia would compare most favorably with South Carolina, but I have long since learned to hold my temper and try to be fair and just; in other words, to use a practical illustration, if I belonged to the bird family I would much prefer to be a humming bird, attracted by the fragrance of the flower, than to be that bird attracted by the stench of a putrid substance; so I shall proceed to show that there was at least some justification for what I had to say.

On the 27th of January I received this letter, and I have a telegram from the gentleman who sent it authorizing me to use it. The letter is as follows:

Hon. WILLIAM S. HOWARD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I congratulate you on your speech in advocacy of the child-labor bill. Spartanburg is the center of the largest cotton manufacturing district in the South, ranking second only to Lowell, Mass. Until last September conditions here were just as you describe, and not all due to the cotton mills either.

I have been superintendent of the city schools of Spartanburg 21 years. I have been teaching 33 years, and have been advocating compulsory attendance for 31 years. Last year I prepared a bill for State-wide compulsory school attendance for the entire term, age limit 8 to 14 years. The legislature enacted an optional law and I succeeded in getting it in operation in this city. If the law had applied to the whole State, there would now be no necessity for the proposed Keating law.

I inclose herewith a copy of the report which I made to the South Carolina State Teachers' Association at its annual meeting last year. Please read on page 6, of the statement made before the joint meeting of the committees on education concerning the Palmer-Owen bill.

You need not return the report, as it has been published in the minutes of the association.

Wishing you great success in your important work for the children of the South, I am,

Very truly, yours, FRANK EVANS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read an extract or two from this report made by the joint committees on education of the House and Senate of South Carolina:

Your weak legislator is an animal who holds his head to the ground to see what he can hear, and he does not always head aright. He has not yet learned that wireless telephony passes through the air and that men of intelligence do not have to crawl on the ground. One fellow said, "I reckon we'll have to fix you up some sort of a law." Another admitted that "the people seem to want some sort of a law." He evidently had no notion of what was needed and took no pains to find out. Nor were the representatives of this type more progressive in their ideas on the subject of election reform—

And so forth.

I read again:

I called attention to the Palmer-Owen child-labor bill, then pending in Congress. Some of them had never heard of it before. When I explained to them that it was a very brief bill, a very simple bill, providing that the carriers of interstate commerce, the railroads and steamboat lines, shall not transport the products of any factory or mine that employs or permits the labor of children under 14 years of age, providing also for any officer of the factory or mine who violates that act the punishment of a money fine and a sentence in the penitentiary, they said such a law could never pass Congress; that the interstate commerce had nothing to do with our children. The Palmer bill did pass the National House, however, by an extraordinary and nonpartisan majority. The vote was 232 to 44. It would undoubtedly have passed the Senate by a decisive nonpartisan majority had it been brought to a vote before adjournment.

Now, gentlemen, I am not going to say on this floor that South Carolina is any more backward than Georgia in educational advantages. If I did, I would be misrepresenting the fact. Neither would I say that North Carolina is any worse off than Georgia, because we are all about on an equality; but I do not want you gentlemen from the North Atlantic States to have any comfort from this, because you are just about as bad off as we are. I have got a report of the States, by school districts, from 1904 to 1914——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not want all the blame to be put on the South. I find the percentage of attendance of school population enrolled in the North Atlantic division is 69.96; in the North Central division, 76.75; the South Atlantic division, which embraces the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and practically all the Southern States, our general average of attendance is 72.39. The South Central division is 72.5 and the Western division is 81.84. So that we are all about on a parity. But I want to say to you, gentlemen, some practical things that come from folks who know. Here is a letter from a poor fellow who is a weaver in a mill in Anderson, S. C., and he asked me not to give his name, and I am going to keep faith with him. He says:

Representative HOWARD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write you to-day to say I am glad to see in the papers the fight you are making for Keating child-labor law, you and Mr. SHERLEY, while the rest of our southern crowd—

He said "crowd," but he meant "Congressmen"— are trying to defeat it. Them petitions they got up there from S. C. was gotton up by the mill presidents and are nothing but forgeries, Mr. HOWARD, and you know it is true a grate many signed them but they done it for feare of being fired out of job or else did not know what they was doing. What you told them about no account drunken dadys is every word the truth. I know 500 at the mills at Anderson that dont do nothin but tote dinner to thayre little children, some of them not 10 years old to work all day some as low 20 cents a day. It is a burning shame and I and thousands of others are glad to see you on our side and for right. I do hope you will get through and enacted into law an enforced, not no sham thing like our State law. Thes are fact, Mr. HOWARD, as sure as you live. I will a little later on write you again and tell you my name, would do so now but it might get into print etc.

Yours truly, ——— ———.

And he says he is a weaver.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not any sentimental question. I have always been like I am now. I have been fighting the employment of child labor in my State for 16 years. Anybody who tries to fool this House into the belief that ignorance in a State participating in the elections of that State is not the greatest liability of that State are simply fools for the want of sense. [Applause.] Take the great State of Wisconsin, from which Mr. LENROOT hails, and other gentlemen here on the floor; take their average attendance, take the statistics of the progress of that great State, and it shows you that the greatest asset that any State can have is an intelligent, educated people within its borders. You can not keep down intelligence, but you can always enslave ignorance. And from an economical standpoint, what do I care about the opinion of a fly-specking technical lawyer about the constitutionality of a question when it liberates from ignorance a certain class in my State. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right under general permission already granted.

Mr. HOWARD. The statistics referred to above are as follows:

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the saddest thing about this controversy to my mind is not that certain owners of cotton mills in the South are fighting for the right to continue the employment of child labor, but that those who are upon this floor fighting this bill represent a substantial percentage of fathers and mothers of those States who desire the right to continue to coin into dollars the lives of their own children. The next saddest thing is that any Member can be found to rise on his feet upon this floor and defend the employment of little children in the factories of our country—and most of those who are opposed to this bill do defend that very thing—even the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], one of the ablest Members of this House, and one who commands the respect of us all, in his speech made one week ago to-day defended this very thing.

I quote just a paragraph:

Our mill employees are against this bill because it prescribes an unreasonable restriction upon their inherent right to labor, and because it would deprive them of the right to teach their children and have them help in a reasonable way to contribute toward the family expense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it did not seem to me possible that these gentlemen would rise here and take the attitude that they do with reference to the right to employ child labor unless there was a considerable sentiment among their own constitutents that they do so. I read the hearings before the committee upon this bill, and I made some amazing discoveries, not only relating to the employment of child labor, but in reference to other great questions. One of the men who appeared before that committee was Mr. David Clark, of Charlotte, N. C., the editor of the Southern Textile Bulletin, and in his testimony the question of compulsory education arose, and this is what he said:

When these people come from the mountains they do not believe in education. That is the reason we do not have compulsory education in North Carolina, because the isolated mountain districts—would go Republican if we forced compulsory education on them.

Mark the words—

A little later in the same hearing he said:

Well, the State is Democratic—most of it—and our western counties are largely isolated communities. Those people are on the balance of power, and if we put on a State-wide system of compulsory education it would swing the balance the other way, because people of the isolated rural sections do not want compulsory education.

Mr. NOLAN, a member of the committee, said:

Do you not think you are giving a mighty lot of consideration to the minority down there?

Mr. CLARK. If it will make them the majority; yes, sir. They have been in the majority in our tenth district. We often elect a Republican Congressman from there. We have one in this Congress.

Mr. COOPER. You people in North Carolina blame your condition on the Republicans?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no; they blame it on a certain class of people who live in the mountains.

Mr. NOLAN. They do not want to educate the Democrats, because they are afraid they might vote the Republican ticket if they were educated.

That was said in a spirit of pleasantry, but Mr. CLARK took it seriously and said.

They vote the Democratic ticket now. If you force on them compulsory education they might change around and vote the other way for spite.

Mr. Chairman, would anyone believe that any political party in any section of the Union or in any State of the Union would refuse to provide for the education of little children for merely political reasons? Why, Mr. Chairman, I should think that any man who would get up and defend these conditions in these States would blush with shame. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest we proceed now with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending which is offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we close debate on this section in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Can you not give us 10 minutes over here?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all further debate on this section and amendments pending thereto be closed within 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point that there is no quorum present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven gentlemen are present, a quorum.

So the motion to limit debate to 10 minutes is agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the——

Mr. LEWIS. I believe the gentleman from South Carolina did not have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is chairman of the committee and is entitled to the floor if he desires.

Mr. FINLEY. For how long?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes. If the gentleman from Maryland does not care for the floor, he can recognize some one else.

Mr. LEWIS. Go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is recognized.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate here, and I want to say to the committee that there is a total misconception of the people from the mill section of the South as to this bill. I stand for education. I stand for an intelligent and an enlightened American citizenship; and the man who stands here or elsewhere and says I do not, does not speak the truth. I have advocated for many years such legislation as would give to the laboring people of this country what they were entitled to in order to make them competent, fit American citizens, and to discharge their duties. I want to say to the gentleman—I do not know what State he is from—that South Carolina has a modified compulsory-education law. This bill, in my judgment, will not affect South Carolina at all, but I say to the gentleman this, that what we do oppose is that everything that can be thought of is brought to the Congress of the United States, and the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution is invoked in order to do it, and for what? I say to the gentleman this, that if you would put down socialism, you must leave to the States the right to enact such legislation. We are taking care of our factory people, taking care of the people who work in the mills and the mines, and it does not lie in the mouth of any man to say that we do not. And I repudiate the statements as false.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate somewhat to rise for the first time on these floors, but I do desire to say a word in behalf of this bill. I am now and always have been opposed to child labor. I have listened very attentively to the men on the other side of the Chamber who have opposed this measure, and it seems to me that they would have us believe that if this bill becomes a law it would entirely destroy the manufacturing industries, or the cotton mills and the silk mills of the South.

Now, what does the bill provide? It provides that when any State in the Union permits little children of tender age—between the ages of 14 and 16—to work over eight hours a day, then they shall not ship those child-made products into other States of the Union that already have laws upon the statute books protecting the children in that State. They failed to tell the Members of this House that this bill provides that their children can work between the ages of 14 and 16, providing they do not work over eight hours a day. Is there any man on the floor of this House that would oppose eight hours a day for little children? Why, the Government sees to it that its big, strong men shall not work over eight hours a day.

Hundreds of labor organizations all over this country have been granted the eight-hour day, and at this time there is a concerted movement all over the United States of America amongst the railroad employees for an eight-hour day. And yet we have men who stand on the floor of this House and say that if we prohibit them from working the innocent children over eight hours we will destroy their cotton mills and their silk mills in the South.

For many years you have heard much on the floor of these Halls in regard to conservation—the conservation of our public lands, our mineral fields, and our water-power sites. We have just passed a measure for the conservation of our public resources, which is all very well and good. I would that we could have more conservation of our natural resources than we have to-day. But, oh, how I would to God that this Congress would get interested in the conservation of its manhood and its womanhood, in the conservation of its little boys and girls. [Applause.] For, after all, what is it that makes a nation great? It is not our large cities with paved streets and avenues over which we drive our high-powered automobiles. It is not our large manufacturing industries. It is not our banking institutions. It is not a large Army or a great Navy. No. Each country is measured up by its standard of citizenship and by the efficiency of its citizens. But it seems to me that whenever any measure is presented to this body which has for its ultimate purpose the uplifting of humanity or trying to make this a better, cleaner, and a purer place to live in; whenever a measure like this comes before this House, we always have some one stand here and bring forward the question of State rights, personal liberty, or the constitutionality of such a measure.

Now, I am not a lawyer. I come from the ranks of labor. I know what it is to have had callouses on my hands since I was 13 years old. I am not a lawyer, and therefore I am not qualified to pass on the constitutionality of this measure. But I do believe that this body ought to have the right to pass any measure that would have for its ultimate purpose the conservation of the human race. [Applause.] For, after all, that is the greatest asset that we have in our country to-day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] stated just a little while ago that this bill was unusual and revolutionary. Now, Mr. Chairman, that statement coming from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House seems to me a little strange, in view of the fact that about 40 States of the Union have enacted legislation similar in terms to those of this bill. And I predict, Mr. Chairman, that after this bill shall have become a law and we come to look upon it as one of the beneficent measures that have been passed by this House, the gentleman from North Carolina will wish that that statement, as well as a great many of those which he made here last Wednesday and the amendments that he then offered in his endeavor to defeat this bill by leading a filibuster, were stricken from the RECORD.

And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] has occupied some time this morning in arguing against this bill because it deals with child labor in this country and does not also deal with child labor in Europe and other foreign countries by prohibiting the importation into this country of child-made products from abroad. Now, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from South Carolina can not see any difference between the duty which this Government owes to the children of our own country and that which it owes to the children of foreign countries, but those of us who are in favor of this bill recognize the difference. This bill is intended to benefit those who produce the objects transported in interstate commerce, rather than the products that are transported. And this Government has no right and is under no duty to legislate for the benefit of the laborers of other countries.

Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a member of the committee which reported this bill to the House. I attended every meeting of the committee during the hearings on the bill, and desire to say here that every question connected with this subject was given the most careful consideration by the committee. Those who were opposed to the bill appeared before the committee and testified to the favorable conditions under which children are employed in the cotton mills of North and South Carolina and other Southern States. Representatives of a number of these great industries presented to the committee what, to my mind, was convincing proof that the cotton mills of the South have in recent years responded in a marked degree to an aroused public sentiment, and have greatly improved the conditions under which their employees work. It was shown that most of these great industries are carrying on a system of welfare work that is commendable and is contributing to the educational, moral, and physical improvement of those working in the mills; and, Mr. Chairman, I think the people of these great cotton-raising States of the South, that struggled so long under adverse economic conditions, should be proud of the wonderful growth of their cotton-manufacturing industries, which have given profitable employment to their white labor and a home market for their own cotton.

But it seems there are certain kinds of work connected with the cotton mills which can be easily done by children, and the operators of the mills, who no doubt have found it profitable to use the cheaper labor of children, as well as the parents of the children, who either want or need the wages they earn, have in some few of these States prevented the enactment of child-labor legislation, which the great majority of the American people have concluded is necessary for the proper protection and well-being of the children.

Mr. Chairman, it was shown to the committee that there are now 27 States which have child-labor laws preventing the employment of children under 14 years of age in factories, and 18 other States which have the 14-year limit with certain exceptions, as by special permit, or during vacations in certain specified industries.

I find that there are 20 States which have laws preventing children under 16 years old from working in mines or quarries, or both, and 3 others which have the 16-year limit with certain exceptions.

I find that there are 19 States which have laws providing for an eight-hour day for children under 16 years who work in factories, and 4 others which have the eight-hour day with certain exceptions.

I find that there are 34 States which have laws which prevent the employment of children under 16 years old at night work in factories, and 5 other States which prohibit night work under 16 years, with certain exceptions.

The fact that so many of the different States, with their varied classes of population, differing climatic conditions, and diversified industries, have enacted laws for the prevention or protection of child labor, which are almost identical, ought to be sufficient to convince us that there has come to be almost a common conscience, a consensus of opinion in this country on the subject of child labor in mines, quarries, mills, canneries, and in manufacturing and other industries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill harmonize, in the main, with the laws of most of the States that have legislated on this subject. The committee, after a most careful consideration of the labor laws of all these different States, have reported this bill, which in their opinion conforms to and is in harmony with the consensus of public sentiment of the whole country, in so far as the public sentiment has found expression in the child-labor laws to which I have just referred.

It was well stated on last Wednesday by the chairman of the Labor Committee, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], that there are two questions to be considered by Congress in connection with this proposed legislation—its desirability and its validity.

I do not see how there can be any serious difference of opinion as to the desirability of this law. It is not claimed by anyone that it will injure or disturb the cotton-mill industries themselves. Mr. Chairman, I would be slow to support any measure which I thought would seriously interfere with this splendid development and successful operation of the cotton mills of the Southern States. But the representatives of these mills who testified at the hearings, all said this proposed legislation would not in any manner injure the industries; children 14 years old can be employed for the same wages as children under 14 years. They base their opposition to the bill on the ground that it would be a hardship upon the children themselves, many of whom have to work to support themselves or, in some instances, their widowed mothers.

Mr. Chairman, while I am convinced that the owners of many of these cotton mills are doing commendable welfare work in the interest of their employees, I can not help looking with some suspicion upon the fact that the owners and the managers of the mills came to Washington with their witnesses and attorneys to oppose the enactment of a reasonable child-labor law, under the pretense that they are doing so in the sole interest of the children whom they work. Unfortunately, labor in the cotton-mill communities of the South is not organized. These employees have no organization to which they can look to safeguard their interests, and through which they can speak. Under these unusual circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to disregard the testimony of their employers who pretend to be speaking in their interests, when I know that their claims and their recommendations are out of harmony with the legislation of at least 40 other great States of our country. Mr. Chairman, I do not need the testimony of physicians upon the injurious results of long hours of work for children, although I think evidence of this character was submitted to the Labor Committee of the last Congress and resubmitted to the present committee. Nor am I willing to follow the views of those who employ the children and profit by their labors.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any child, boy or girl, under 14 years of age ever voluntarily sought and continued employment that confined him or her to a continuing task for from 8 to 11 hours a day. It is contrary to human nature to expect such a thing. Children of that age need fresh air and sunshine; they need play and recreation; and common sense tells us that they will not work at a continuing task where they are confined indoors unless under compulsion. And, Mr. Chairman, when the parents of children under 14 years of age, through ignorance or selfishness, or even for a more commendable motive, if you please, insist on driving them into the mills or canneries or factories, and keeping them there for 8 or 10 hours a day, I say that it is time for the Government to step in and say to the parents, "You shall not do it."

This duty rests, of course, upon the State government in the first instance. But when the State fails to do its duty, I believe the National Government should extend its strong arm and, as far as it can do so within its constitutional limitations, protect little children from the selfishness of employers and the ignorance or indifference of their parents by prohibiting the products of their enforced labors from the privileges of interstate commerce. There is always found to be some local opposition to legislation of this kind. But those who oppose it are often the first to praise it after it has been tried. And I fancy that the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WEBB] and the other gentlemen who have been trying to defeat this bill by conducting a filibuster against it will some day wish the story of their futile efforts were stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent one of the great industrial districts of the country. There are almost 10,000 coal miners living in my district. Formerly boys under 14 years of age were allowed to work in the mines. Many boys of that age went down into the darkness of the earth to engage in that hazardous work in a commendable effort to support themselves or dependent parents. But more often did the fathers themselves take their boys into the mines to get the wages of their labors. Finally the law was changed so that none under 16 years old could work in the mines. This may have worked a hardship in some instances, but I know that it was a good law. I know that it protected the lives and health of the boys of Illinois and gave them opportunities they would not have had, and no one would now question for a moment the wisdom and the justice of that law.

The voice of labor has spoken so forcibly all over this country against child labor in mines, mills, and factories and in favor of the eight-hour law that I believe that Congress should hear the appeal and go as far as it can in the interest of the children. And so I do not believe there can be any serious difference of opinion as to the wisdom and justice of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it is one of the most wonderful things about our Constitution, in my judgment, that by it there is given to the Federal Government all the powers necessary to guarantee its own perpetuity. One of its wisest and most far-reaching provisions is that clause wherein the Congress is given power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States. It is the duty of any Government to provide by appropriate legislation for the general welfare of its citizens. In protecting its children from the greed of those who would exploit their labors, or from the ignorance or selfishness of parents who would force or permit them to work, the Government is but humanely providing for the welfare of its future citizens. While the duty clearly rests upon the several States to provide for the welfare of their citizens by appropriate legislation on the subject of child labor, I believe that when the States fail to act the Federal Government should do its part by prohibiting those who would profit through the State's neglect from the privileges of interstate commerce.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the constitutionality of this bill presents a more difficult question. I confess I was at first of the opinion that the bill, if it should become a law, would be held unconstitutional. I feared that it might be held that this legislation was but an attempt to do indirectly what Congress could not do directly; that is, legislate upon questions of purely local employment and production. But the more I have considered the question, in view of the later decisions of the Supreme Court, the further I have gotten from my first opinion. It is still a doubtful question in my mind whether the bill, if it passes, will be held valid should its validity be tested.

But, Mr. Chairman, this legislation is of such importance to the country, its desirability is so clear, I am willing to give the bill the benefit of any doubt I may have as to its validity. This suggests, I know, a question upon which there is some difference of opinion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated in his discussion of the bill on last Wednesday, if I remember correctly, that when we have doubts of the constitutionality of a measure we should vote against it. Those who share this view usually quote Judge Cooley, who says in his General Principles of Constitutional Law that "to pass an act when they (legislators) are in doubt whether it is not violating the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume."

I have always had the highest respect for Judge Cooley; but he lived and wrote years ago. Constitutional law has developed wonderfully in late years. The attitude of the courts toward the Constitution has changed. And, moreover, Judge Cooley was a judge and jurist. He was not a legislator, I believe; and while I am willing to accept his statement as to the duty and proper attitude of a lawyer or judge toward the law, I am not willing to accept his statement as to the duty of a legislator when in doubt as to the constitutionality of a proposed law.

Unlike the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I think if we have only a doubt of the constitutionality of a bill which does not amount to a positive conviction it is our duty to vote for it.

On the question of the desirability of a proposed law our decision must be final. The courts will not review it. If we have doubts on that subject, we should vote against it.

But upon its constitutionality our decision is not final. After we act the Supreme Court still passes upon its validity. The final responsibility on that question rests with the courts and not with us. Should we adopt the other view and never pass a law when we have any doubts as to its constitutionality there would be little or no progress in our constitutional law; the tendency of the courts would be to adopt an interpretation of the Constitution that would be rigid rather than elastic; and this elasticity of interpretation under which the Supreme Court has repeatedly extended the commerce clause of the Constitution beyond commonly accepted notions of its limitations has, I think, resulted in great good to the country.

Mr. Chairman, if we have doubts as to the desirability of a proposed law, I think we should not pass it. But if we have doubts as to its validity only, I think we should pass it and let the courts, who are better able to judge than we, determine whether or not it is constitutional.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I confess I have some doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill. But I am so strongly impressed with its desirability I think we should pass it and let the courts say whether or not it is valid.

The Supreme Court has been so liberal in construing the commerce clause of the Constitution, has gone so far in sustaining other laws under that clause, that no one can tell with any reasonable certainty what the court would do in passing upon this bill if it becomes a law. We can only reason about it from what has been done in other cases. The precise question involved has not been presented in any of the reported cases, so far as I have learned.

Mr. Chairman, very able and learned arguments both for and against the constitutionality of the bill were made before the committee. The pivotal question involved is a nice one. Able lawyers would differ about it, and I doubt not it will present perplexities to the courts that pass upon it. But I have found that the Supreme Court is not entirely immune to the influence of public sentiment. That there is a very decided public sentiment upon the question of child labor must be admitted, because so many States have legislated upon it. And in view of other cases where the Supreme Court has construed the commerce clause there is good reason for the hope, if not for the belief, that the court would sustain this bill if it passes.

Mr. Chairman, I would not attempt here to make a technical argument on the constitutionality of this bill. I would only give a few reasons that have led me to the opinion that it will be held constitutional. Section 8 of the first article of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The grant of power to regulate commerce among the States is in the same language, and until the adoption of the fifth amendment was as plenary as the grant of power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It has been decided by the Supreme Court in a number of cases that the power to regulate foreign commerce was absolute and included the power to prohibit.

Now, when the fifth amendment was adopted, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, a limitation was thereby imposed upon the power of Congress over interstate commerce which was until then absolute. This limitation does not apply to the power to regulate foreign commerce, because, I think, it is fundamental that the citizens of the different States have a vested right to transport their property from one State to another in the course of commerce, whereas they have no such vested right with foreign nations. I think the Supreme Court has held that the power of Congress over foreign commerce is absolute; and that it is just as absolute over interstate commerce, subject to the limitation that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law.

Mr. Chairman, in studying the decisions of the Supreme Court, where the court held the Louisiana lottery law, the pure food and drugs act, and the Mann white slave act valid, I am impressed with the views of Dr. Parkinson, expressed in the committee report, that the power conferred upon Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution is not confined to the regulation of interstate commerce in the interests of the commerce itself or of its instrumentalities, but it includes also the right to regulate interstate commerce in the interests of the public health, safety, morals, and welfare. I think there is much force in the argument that the Supreme Court sustained the lottery legislation and the Mann white slave act on the ground that the power to regulate interstate commerce included the power to regulate it in the interests of the public morals and public welfare; and the pure food and drugs act was upheld because the power to regulate interstate commerce included the power to regulate it in the interests of the public health and welfare by preventing fraud and imposition upon those persons who received the articles of commerce in the States into which they are shipped.

And, Mr. Chairman, if it be conceded, as it must be, that Congress has the power, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to regulate interstate commerce in the interests of the safety, health, morals, and welfare of those who are to receive the things transported at the end of their journey, why does not Congress have the same right to regulate commerce in the interests of the safety, health, morals, and welfare of those who produce the things transported at the beginning of their journey. For my part I can see no logical distinction.

If this conclusion is correct, the only question that remains is whether this bill, which would prohibit interstate commerce in those things that are produced by children under the prohibited ages or by children working more than the legal hours, can be said to be in the interests of the safety, health, morals, or welfare of those producing the objects transported.

Upon this question, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the Supreme Court would disregard or set aside the judgment of the Congress unless it should appear that the action of Congress was unreasonable or arbitrary. And in determining that question the Supreme Court would not fail to take into consideration the fact that the provisions of this bill are, generally speaking, in harmony with the provisions of State laws in about 40 of the different States of the Union. A bill which thus represents the concensus of of public opinion can not, I think, be held unreasonable or arbitrary. Mr. Chairman, I find that laws similar to this that have been passed by the State legislatures have been uniformly sustained not only by the supreme courts of the States, but by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides that no State shall pass any law which shall deprive any citizen of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. In other words, the fourteenth amendment imposes exactly the same limitation on State legislation that the fifth amendment imposes on legislation by Congress. Yet the Supreme Court has held that State laws regulating child labor similar in every respect to this bill are within the police powers of the State, which means the power to legislate for the public good, notwithstanding the limitation imposed upon the States by the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if the several States can properly legislate upon the subject of child labor under their general police powers without violating the limitation imposed upon them by the fourteenth amendment, I can not see why Congress may not legislate upon the same subject under a similar police power without violating the limitation imposed upon it by the fifth amendment. The States may legislate on questions of commerce within their borders, but can not control interstate commerce. Congress can legislate on questions of interstate commerce alone. The power of each to legislate within its proper field is the same, and the limitations upon that power in the fifth and fourteenth amendments are the same. And since the Supreme Court has held that the child-labor laws of the States are not unconstitutional, I think it is not an unreasonable conclusion that the same court will hold that this bill governing interstate commerce is not unconstitutional.

At least, Mr. Chairman, these considerations have been sufficient to change the opinion which I formerly had upon this question, and to lead me to the belief that this bill is within the constitutional power of Congress; and while I still have some doubts upon this question, I hope that this bill will become a law and that its validity will be tested. If it is sustained, there are many laws which Congress could pass under the interstate commerce clause that would, in my judgment, be of great benefit to the people of this country. And while I would not be willing to amend the Constitution for this purpose, I would like to see the power of Congress under the interstate commerce clause extended just as far as it reasonably can be.

Mr. Chairman, this is no partisan measure. There ought not to be any politics in it. Yet, I am proud to say that the gentlemen on this side of the House are almost unanimously in favor of this bill, and that the fight against it is being made by the Democrats. And while they tried to defeat the bill on last Wednesday by offering a flood of amendments to the bill and otherwise trying to filibuster against it, I hope that notwithstanding this opposition among the Democrats enough of them will stand with the Republicans to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman already has that privilege. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in the form of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALLINGER, of Massachusetts, moves to amend by adding the following new section after section 4:

"That it shall be unlawful for any carrier of interstate commerce to transport or accept for transportation in interstate commerce the product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment offered to it for such transportation by any person, firm, or corporation which owns or operates such mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, or by any officer, agent, or servant of said person, firm, or corporation, until the president, secretary, or general manager of such corporation, or a member of such firm, or the person owning or operating such mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, shall file with said carrier an affidavit setting forth that none of the products so offered have been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years, or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years, who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock postmeridian, or before the hour of 7 o'clock antemeridian: Provided, however, That in lieu of the affidavit hereinbefore provided, the president, secretary, or general manager of any corporation, or the member of any firm, or any person owning or operating any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, as aforesaid, may file with the Secretary of Labor a general affidavit setting forth that for the six months preceding the filing thereof, in said mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, no children under the age of 14 years have been employed in any capacity, and that no children between the ages of 14 years and 16 years have worked more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock postmeridian, or before the hour of 7 o'clock antemeridian, which general affidavit shall be renewed each six months thereafter. The form of said affidavits shall be prescribed by the board composed of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, as hereinafter provided."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment. The gentleman offered substantially the same amendment when this bill was last under consideration. It is not therefore in order to offer it again.

Mr. MANN. It is not offered in the same place.

Mr. FOSTER. But this amendment was offered in the consideration of this bill before. The gentleman surely does not contend that it can be offered again?

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, the fact that an amendment offered to one place in the bill is voted down is no reason why the same amendment can not be offered in another place in the bill, because the committee and the House may not wish to put such a provision in one place in the bill and might want to put it in another place. That question constantly arises.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the House has voted on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Not on this amendment. It has voted against inserting this matter in another place in the bill. If the Chair should so rule, the easiest way in the world to defeat a proposition would be for somebody to offer it as an amendment in the wrong place in the bill, and then the committee, refusing to insert it in the wrong place in the bill, under the gentleman's contention would refuse to insert it afterwards in the right place.

Mr. FOSTER. I insist that you can offer an amendment at each paragraph of the bill if it should be germane, but you can not keep on doing it over and over again.

Mr. MANN. You could offer a thousand amendments to this bill. We met that situation the other day, and disposed of it, I think, in a way very satisfactory to the majority.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that it is the offering of the same amendment twice.

Mr. MANN. The Chair would not be justified in holding that because the committee decided that an amendment was not appropriate in one place in the bill, therefore it was not appropriate in another place in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. However, I think I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not worded exactly the same as the one that was offered by me as an amendment to section 1 a week ago to-day. There are certain perfecting words that have been inserted.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have offered this amendment at this place, where it more properly belongs, as a new section, not for the purpose of delay but simply because I have been asked by several Members of this House to offer it again, Members who believe as I do, that the bill in its present form can not be enforced and that it will be practically impossible to get a conviction under it. Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] in his very interesting speech to-day read a letter from a weaver who expressed the hope that we would not pass any sham bill like the South Carolina law, and that is why I have ventured to take up the time of this House this afternoon to try to persuade the House not to pass a bill that may prove to be a sham bill; not simply to pass a bill so that we can go back to our constituents and say we put a child-labor law on the statute book, a law that never can be enforced, but that we have put something on the statute book that can be effectively enforced. Now, I have not seen or heard any reason advanced by the committee why the carrier should not be made liable under this bill. In the Federal statutes governing the transportation of explosives from State to State and in the statutes prohibiting the transportation of obscene and immoral literature from State to State you hold the carrier, as well as the shipper, and even the receiver, liable. Why do you make an exception in this bill, which is proposed to be enacted under the same interstate commerce clause of the Constitution? There is no real hardship imposed upon the railroads by the provisions of this amendment. This amendment simply provides that no carrier shall accept for transportation in interstate commerce any goods unless an affidavit accompanies them that the provisions of this act have been complied with in their production. And then, in order to do away with the burden of having to file a separate affidavit with each shipment, it is provided that a general affidavit may be filed semiannually with the Secretary of Labor here in Washington stating that no children under 14 years of age have been employed in any capacity in any particular establishment and that the other provisions of the act have been complied with. This general affidavit will be filed by shippers, manufacturers, and producers in every State in this Union that has an up-to-date child-labor law, and no burden will be occasioned either to the carrier or to the shipper in those States.

In those States, on the other hand, where they have failed or refused to enact decent child-labor legislation the temptation will be strong to file a general affidavit in order to get rid of the bother and trouble and burden of filing separate affidavits, and once the general affidavit is filed you can always get a conviction under this act. All you have got to prove is the fact that a child under 14 years of age has been found by the Government inspector working in that particular establishment and you are sure to obtain your conviction. On the other hand, under this bill as drawn, the burden of proof is ultimately placed on the Government to show that the labor of any particular child has actually entered into the production of a commodity that has been or is going to be transported beyond the boundaries of a particular State. After the manufacturer has put on evidence to contradict your prima facie case the Government must prove by evidence that the goods on which that child was working had been or were going to be carried into another State. And how is the Government going to do that? In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it can not do it. The judge will charge the jury to that effect and you will not get any conviction.

Mr. Chairman, if you want to put upon the statute book a child-labor act that has got teeth in it and that can be enforced, you will adopt my amendment. If you simply want to put on the statute book a child-labor law, the enforcement of which will be difficult, if not impossible, you will vote against the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] was considered by the House last Wednesday and quite properly rejected, and I trust the House will vote down the amendment at this time.

This bill has been carefully drafted after consultation with men and women who have devoted their lives to the task of enforcing legislation of this kind. It is their judgment that this bill has "teeth." And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts is presuming a great deal when he sets up his judgment against the judgment of those men and women, sweeping aside this entire bill, and branding it as a sham bill. One of the very best evidences that this bill has "teeth," that it can be enforced and will be enforced, is the determined opposition with which it has been met.

Now, I trust that the Members of this House will not adopt amendments which will unnecessarily weigh down the bill.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman who introduced this bill please explain to the House what reason there is for not holding the carrier as well as the shipper liable?

Mr. KEATING. There is one very good reason—it is unnecessary. It is unnecessary to burden every shipper in this country with the task of making an affidavit such as is provided in the gentleman's amendment. The great mass of our interstate commerce is produced by adult labor, and child labor has nothing to do with it. The great majority of the interstate shippers have nothing to do with child labor, and under the gentleman's amendment it will be necessary for them—every six months, under the amendment which the gentleman offered last Wednesday—to file an affidavit with the Secretary of Labor. It would also be a burden upon the common carriers of the country. If it were necessary to impose that burden upon producers, shippers, and carriers, I would not hesitate to impose it; but why place that unnecessary burden upon them when the mass of evidence submitted by the men and women who have had experience, and who advocate this bill, is that it is unnecessary, and that the bill as it stands can and will be enforced.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. KENT. I should like to ask the gentleman whether in the phosphorus-match law there is any similar clause?

Mr. KEATING. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. HOWARD. That was a taxation bill.

Mr. KEATING. I am not familiar with the bill that the gentleman mentions; but so far as this bill is concerned, the committee objects to the amendment because it is unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] is worthy of consideration, but it seems to me that it ought not to be agreed to. It proposes to penalize the innocent, not to punish the guilty. I think in laws of this kind it is usually a little better to put the punishment upon those who violate the proprieties of the law instead of penalizing those who obey the law.

Under the gentleman's amendment there would be punishment against the carrier, who is absolutely innocent as far as he is concerned. The carrier does not produce by child labor; the carrier has nothing to do except to transport the goods which are presented to him, and he ought not to be obliged to ascertain where the goods are produced regardless of whether they were produced under the law or in violation of the law. That question has been repeatedly before Congress.

Nor are those who obey the law entitled to be penalized. It is those who violate the provisions in reference to child labor—those who employ child labor—that we are desiring to reach. The amendment of my friend from Massachusetts would reach every manufacturer in the United States, although the great majority of them obey the law in reference to child labor. They would be subjected to the annoyance and trouble just the same as if they violated the law. I do not think that is desirable. If we provide, as is provided in the bill, a penalty against those who ship the goods produced by child labor and then give to the agents of the Government an opportunity of ascertaining whether child labor is employed in the manufacturing establishments, we provide a complete law and an organization to enforce it, and we can prevent the shipment of goods in interstate commerce made by those who use child labor, directing our attention to them, and not endeavoring to inconvenience the whole mass of manufacturing industry and carrier industry of the United States who are entirely innocent.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make any remarks concerning the bill now before the House, but there have been so many reflections and false statements uttered against the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I feel that I would be unworthy of my position as a Representative on the floor of this House if I did not say something in rebuttal of those false and misleading statements.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], speaking about educational conditions in my State, said that Mr. Clark had testified before the committee that the reason we did not have compulsory education in North Carolina was that if we did enact such a law it would cause the State to go Republican. It is unfortunate, indeed, that a measure of this kind can not be considered apart from party politics. However, I notice in the papers that Mr. Clark has repudiated a portion of the remarks attributed to him along this line.

Western North Carolina has a modified system of compulsory education, and the people there are just as zealous for the welfare of their children, educationally and otherwise, as are the people of any other section of the country. My home is among the mountains of western North Carolina, of which section I am proud, and I claim to know something of the real conditions there; and I want to say that those people need no help from the outside world, and especially do they not need advice from those who know nothing at all about their real conditions or domestic affairs. No State in this Union has made more rapid progress along educational and industrial lines for the past 10 years than has North Carolina. We have in our State an educational qualification or requirement in order to exercise the right of the franchise. This has done more to promote the cause of education within our borders than will all the child-labor laws you can pass between now and doomsday.

Those who are so strenuously advocating this legislation have had a cordial invitation to go to our State and get information at first hand and see the actual conditions that prevail there. But they preferred to listen to sensation mongers and muckrakers. The committee was invited to go there and make examination of mill conditions and labor conditions in those mills, but they also declined. But if they had accepted the invitation, I have no doubt it would have been very illuminating to their minds, as they appear to be so benighted on the subject.

As an example I would like to have these alarmists make a visit to an ideal mill town in my district. This beautiful little city is situated on the main line of the Southern Railway between Washington and Charlotte, 7 miles north of Concord. You will recognize it by a beautiful artificial lake by the side of the railroad about 15 miles south of Salisbury. It is called "The Magic City" down there, but its real nome is Kannapolis, and it was named for its founder, Mr. J. W. Cannon, who is president of the Cannon Manufacturing Co. This company operates a chain of about 20 cotton mills in North Carolina and South Carolina, several of which are in my district, a number of them being located in the town to which I refer. At this particular town which has grown to a population of several thousand since the company built some of its mills there five or six years ago, you will observe the new order that prevails in the South with reference to the conditions and surroundings of mill people since the day when sensational welfare workers found some cause for criticism and complaint. Here you will find neat, sanitary homes for the mill workers, safe and sanitary conditions under which to work; a Young Men's Christian Association especially for the men and boys who are employed in the mills; wholesome amusements for children, a library and reading room and a swimming pool; and a good graded school open for eight or nine months of the year. You will also see a home for girls who work in the mills, but whose parents do not live nearby. This home is in charge of competent matrons, and the girls who live there are as well protected as in the best home.

When you go to this town you will be greeted by a genial, elderly gentleman, a typical executive and man of affairs. This is Mr. Cannon, who has done much to disprove the charges that have been made against southern mill men. However, you may be greeted by one of his several sons, who are associated with him in the management of the great chain of the Cannon mills. They will courteously tell you that you are welcome to observe all the conditions and influences for which the management is in any way responsible in any of their mills. But you will not see any evidences of degeneracy, first, because they are not there, and, second, because you will be so impressed with the ideal conditions that prevail there you will forget all you have heard about bad conditions in the cotton mills of the South. Instead of immoral, depraved young men you will see gentlemanly, robust, and healthy young men, with a purpose written in their faces, and that purpose is to earn the promotion and confidence that is sure to come to them for efficiency and trustworthiness. Instead of wretched, slovenly girls, you will see young women who go about with the bearing of a school mistress and who are not ashamed of their work. The children, too, are just as healthy and as beautiful as other children elsewhere. This is but an example of many mills elsewhere in North Carolina and the South, though they may be on a smaller scale.

It has been stated on this floor that the fathers in North Carolina are coining money out of the labor of their children who work in the mills. I hurl this statement back into the teeth of those who make it as untrue and unworthy to come from the source it does. Of course many children, either at their own instance or by request of their parents, work in the mills of our State, but few of them are under 14 years of age. The conditions under which they work are not harmful, and their hours are not unreasonable. The mill owners of our State, in the main, are among our very best citizens, and they have a humane interest in the welfare of those who work in their mills. They provide for them neat, sanitary homes; good schoolhouses, in which schools are maintained for a good portion of each year at the expense of the mill owners. The fact is the people who work in these mills are far better off than they were before they moved to the mill districts.

The trouble with some of the advocates of this bill is that they "strain at a gnat" in our State, but "swallow a camel" in their own. [Laughter.] Take, for instance, the State of Colorado, from which comes one of the Members having this bill in charge [Mr. KEATING]. If he will compare conditions in our State with those in the State of Colorado, he will not find the comparison favorable to his own State. If those advocating this bill can demonstrate that the children who work in the mills of the South are inferior, either morally or physically, to those of a similar class who are engaged in other occupations or do not work at all, then they will have established their contention; but they can do no such thing because exactly the reverse is true, which has been stated again and again by those familiar with conditions.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that reasonable labor under proper conditions and regulations is not only helpful to children, but is absolutely essential to their well-being. The criminals of our land to-day do not come from the class of people who are brought up to work from childhood, but they come from those who idle and toil not. Idleness produces more vice and crime than any other cause and, since children must be engaged in something, they would much better be employed in some reasonable, honorable work than to be loafing in idleness on the streets, exposed to the evil influences and surroundings with which they must necessarily come in contact.

If you can pass this law, saying that goods which are manufactured in whole or in part by child labor shall not be shipped into another State, then you had just as well pass a law saying that farm products which are produced in whole or in part by child labor shall be denied the privilege of interstate transportation. The principle is the same, and the agitators and "hired mourners" will not cease their activities and lamentations when this law is enacted, but they will still find occasion for interference with every other line of honest endeavor in which children are employed.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I disagree somewhat with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], though I think the principle he states is absolutely correct—that punishment ought to fall on the guilty—but we do find sometimes in the execution of a law that we have to have the assistance of the innocent. If we are really going to pass a child-labor law that will be enforced, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] will make it an enforceable law. We enforce laws against those who are helpless and against whom there can be no accusation brought. Under section 15 of the immigration law every steamer that sails out of any port of the United States—and there can be no accusation made against them as to bringing in improper immigrants—has to file a voluminous report in relation to everyone on board of foreign birth, so as to help our own authorities to enforce the laws in relation to foreign-born people. This does not impose any great burden on the manufacturer—to file twice a year a short affidavit that during the six months he has not empolyed anyone who comes within the prohibition of the statute. That is a very light thing to be placed on the manufacturer. Gentlemen who come from large cities, who are familiar with what manufacturers have to do under the State law——

Mr. MANN. I come from a large city.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, I admit Chicago is a large city. The gentleman can deny it all he pleases, but I affirm that it is and defy him to disprove it—gentlemen who come from large places like Chicago or New York, and I admit that that is a large place, who are familiar, as the gentleman from Illinois is, with what manufacturers have to do under local regulations, would not regard an affidavit every six months as any burden at all in addition to what they are under now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that provision were inserted in the law and the manufacturer was not following the child-labor law, would it not be a very simple thing to have a selling agent who would not be obliged to make this affidavit?

Mr. BENNET. I do not quite get the drift of the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. Turn over the sale of his product to a selling agent. The selling agent is not required to make an affidavit.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; the gentleman from Massachusetts so says.

Mr. MANN. Then every wholesaler would have to make the same affidavit.

Mr. BENNET. Every selling agent of the manufacturer.

Mr. MANN. Every wholesaler would have to make an affidavit, every jobber would have to make an affidavit, and, perchance, every retailer. How ridiculous that is.

Mr. BENNET. Let us assume that is so.

Mr. MANN. Of all goods made in the United States?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no. Let us assume that is so. The act would be enforced, and that, I assume, is the purpose of the gentlemen who are bringing this bill in.

Mr. MANN. I dare say it would not be enforced a year before it would be repealed, if that were the case.

Mr. BENNET. No; if this were put in as the gentleman from Massachusetts desires, within that time the four States of the Union that have not child-labor laws up to what is called the standard would have child-labor laws, and we could get back to what is better enforcement in the long run, and that is enforcement of State laws within the States on their own citizens. That would bring it about, if we once passed a provision that would really compel the law to be observed. You will never convict under section 2. I am going to vote for the bill. I would be for it if there was not anything in it except the title and the perfectly satisfactory enacting clause, in the belief that it would be perfected in another place, because I am in favor of the principle of the law.

Mr. MANN. It will not be perfected in any other place. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I was called out a half hour ago to meet an engagement in connection with the business of the House and have not had the opportunity to be informed of what has been said during my absence. There is some excuse and perhaps justification for this legislation, largely from the material standpoint, that has not been much spoken of. In a few States of the Union child labor is employed. It is prohibited in other States. I apprehend if it were not for that reason this bill would not be pending here, because, as I understand it, the States that permit child labor, which would be prohibited by this bill if enacted into law, already are moving along that line. And I presume, in the light, perhaps, of interested selfishness, from one standpoint and another, they will continue to so move. You will notice that this bill does not interfere with foreign commerce. It prohibits the transportation of products of the mine and quarry produced by labor in whole or in part by children under 16 years of age from one State to another State. It also covers the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, or manufacturing establishment in the United States produced in whole or part by labor of children under 14 years of age. The largest cannery in the United States is at Hoopston, Ill., in my district. I think children do work there during the sweet-corn season, the pea season, the tomato season, and that those children are employed between the ages of 14 and 16, and perhaps some under 14. They are anxious for employment, the canning season is during the school vacation, the ventilation where the work is done is good, and the hours of labor are not oppressive.

The farmers and truckers raise the raw material. I do not know, I am just wondering, but I expect I may vote for this bill, and yet there is a good deal of talk about the children. Now, we are going to have some more talk about the people who are not covered in this bill when we come to farm-loan credits, and then it is going to be the "poor, oppressed farmer," and the "ignorant farmer" who has to be protected, and all that kind of thing. I grew up on a farm, and very largely my district is an agricultural district, with something of manufacturing and something of mining in one or two counties. But it is largely an agricultural district. I know about the farmer. One-third of the people in the United States are farmers. I have no hesitancy in saying that from every standpoint they are quite equal to the other two-thirds of our population.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The most eloquent speech I ever read, I think, upon this question of child labor was from a distinguished Senator who spoke with an eloquent tongue. He is no longer in the public service, but he was wonderful; and as I read his speech the tears came to my eyes when he related how on the farm he had been oppressed, how he had been compelled to get up early, and this, that, and the other. I thought when I read his speech that if he had been under different conditions, if he had not been permitted to work upon a farm, with his father and mother living in a farming country, that possibly he might never have looked inside the boundaries of the Senate. Why, take it in my little city of 40,000 people, take it in your city, take your lawyers and your doctors and your merchants—you will find, if your experience is like mine, that three-fourths of the men who are doing things to-day are men who were boys on the farm or in the mine or in the factory. Their successors 50 years from now will be the boys who learn to hustle when they are young. [Applause.]

There is much talk about social justice. Great heavens, I sometimes wonder what it means! I have sent for the dictionary and I have tried to find out what social justice is. Can any man define it? Is it to make all men equal? Is it to make all men and women equal? Is it to make all boys of equal capacity? Well, so far as I know, as a rule the man and the woman who talk most about social justice are the man and the woman who never earned a dollar but are living on the production that they inherited. [Applause.] They talk about social justice. Then there is another class that talks about it. They are good people, and I am not abusing any of them, but if you will go to work and investigate you will find that two thirds of them never earned a dollar in their lives and that the other third are being subsisted by their contributions. [Applause.]

We are making great progress in this country.

May I say a word about the amendment? I was told what my colleague had said about it. I shall vote against it. It seems to me that it is unduly oppressive, and if the law can be administered at all it can be administered without further vexing the common carriers of the country. Well, you may ask if I am a plutocrat and if I own common carriers? No. I never have been either, so far as that is concerned. And I say to you that if railways in this country, nearly half of the mileage of the whole world, would fail from the standpoint of efficiency for 10 days, half of the population of the United States would be starving. Therefore I do not care to burden them unduly. They come under the rod; yes. They are regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission and various public-utilities commissions, but I would give them, as I would give everybody else, a fair chance under the law, because, after all, we are compelled, this hundred millions of people, to cooperate. No one lives to himself alone. True prosperity comes from liberty and cooperation on the part of the hundred millions, whether they toil in the mine or the quarry or in the textile industry or on the farm or anywhere else.

I thank the committee. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] is recognized.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am very sorry for the men who, whether it be owing to their political situation or to the part of the country from which they come, believe it to be incumbent upon them to fight this kind of legislation. This more than any other legislation that we can consider represents the future welfare of our country. Mr. Chairman, I have little sympathy with the remarks of a gentleman opposed to this bill when I recall the fact that he stated in private conversation, when asked where he stood on this matter, "that the children of his State should not grow up in idleness," and that therefore he believed that they should work in the cotton mills. I do not believe that his own children work in the cotton mills and I do not believe that his children will grow up to habits of idleness.

I know in my own case that I was given abundant opportunity to play, abundant opportunity for outdoor life, as the result of which I am still alive. I have been able to give to a large family of my own children opportunity for outdoor life, for recreation, and, so far as I have been able to watch the growth and tendencies of those children I find in them no suspicion of idleness. I ask for all children of the Nation the reasonable opportunities that I and mine have enjoyed. I have been working for many years on a problem intimately connected with this legislation, which is to furnish playgrounds and recreation centers for children, and at this time I take the opportunity to mention in this House a measure introduced by Mr.

GARDNER, of Massachusetts, providing for the incorporation of the National Playground Association, to the end of recognizing the children's right to outdoor exercise and playtime.

I feel almost guilty in standing up here and seemingly throwing bricks at those unfortunate Members of this House who feel it necessary to defend child labor. I am sorry for them. I apologize for them if they do not apologize for themselves. But when this vote is taken we shall show them that, whatever the conditions are in their own districts, however backward their own people may be, that the Nation stands for the conservation of child life and for the inherent right of children to grow strong and sturdy and hardy under conditions of play, instead of being wrecked by absorbing, driving, ruinous toil.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Labor shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any State factory or mining or quarry inspector, commissioner of labor, State medical inspector, or school-attendance officer, or any other person shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States without delay for the enforcement of the penalties as in such cases herein provided.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 4, strike out the figure "4" and insert the figure "5."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 13, after the word "provided," add the following words: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be held to refer to or include orphans dependent on their own labor for their support, or children whose mother is a widow and who is in part dependent upon their labor for their support, or children whose parents on account of sickness or other providential cause are unable to provide for their support."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust this amendment will be passed by this House and made a part of this bill if the same is to become a law. I can not believe the distinguished gentlemen sitting around this Hall to-day realize the full import of the arguments they have made for the purpose of getting some to vote for this proposition.

As I look over this magnificent body of American manhood and brilliant minds and men of brilliant thought; as I look around these galleries, Mr. Chairman, at the people who to-day occupy those seats, I wonder how it is that we have ever been permitted to survive and to be here for the purpose of enacting laws and listening to the magnificent speeches of gentlemen without such a law as this to protect us when we were growing up. We go out before the people in our districts during a campaign and tell them about the hard struggles we had during childhood's happy days. Each congressional candidate tells the people with some degree of pride that he stands before them a self-made man; that he began to work at an early age, and how he wants to come here because he realizes their needs, and how he hopes to continue to come here in order that he may better represent the people. And now you want to rob the children of to-day, the politicians of to-morrow, of this valuable asset which you have used so well. And yet I am told to-day, Mr. Chairman, that the very heart blood of the boy who works is sapped away, and that the child who labors will never amount to anything when he becomes a man, all of his energy having been exhausted. I am told by distinguished gentlemen who, I believe, frankly, have not investigated this matter, that in the far Southland, which in part I have the honor to represent, they are weaving by some infernal machine the very bodies and souls of children into the cloth that women are wearing on the streets to-day. This I can not believe, as I have never heard of the invention of any such machine.

I will not make any assertion nor will I make any charge as to any other section of the country, for with conditions there I am not familiar; but I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that such is the case in the South; and I want to warn the distinguished gentlemen who are sitting here, and I trust they are paying close attention to this bill, that if this bill becomes a law without the amendment which I have offered, I fear you will make a loafer, yea, a beggar and a thief, of every child under the age of 14 who does not have the necessary means to procure the absolute necessities of life; for a child will beg, yes steal, before he will starve.

Talk about philanthropy. If the gentlemen on this floor will join hands with me and pass a section with the proviso that thousands of dollars, if necessary, be appropriated by the Government for the purpose of educating, clothing, and feeding those children who can not make their own living and have no visible means of support——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. SEARS. No; I fear to yield to the distinguished and learned gentleman, because I realize that I am just breaking into the Halls of Congress, and by his wit and wisdom he might flustrate me. [Laughter.] And, as I was about to say, make the conditions which I have suggested impossible, then they will have accomplished something.

Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to those men who, like myself, equally as well love their mothers and love children. I thank my God that I had the strength—and I am not appealing to the galleries—when I was under the age of 14 to go out and work and make an honest dollar, for I believe I was benefited rather than injured by so doing. And I am trying in my humble way to instill into my little boy of 11 years of age the lesson that it is no disgrace at any age to do an honest day's toil. And yet if this bill becomes a law you tell him if he works before he is 14 years of age somebody is committing a crime, and you not only tell him this, but you say to him he can not work before he is 14, even though he should be starving.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the South, at my hands, needs no defense. In my own State, Florida, which I have the honor in part to represent, we have a law that prevents boys under the age of 10 years from selling papers, and which prevents boys and girls under the age of 12 from working even in stores unless they can come under a proviso somewhat similar to the amendment that I have introduced here to-day. And yet it is the South, you affirm, you are striking at; yet it is my people that by the strong arm of the law must be forced to protect their children. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not doff my hat to any man when it comes to love and respect and admiration for a child. For 10 years it has been my pleasure to give of my time to the education and the uplift of the young men of my county, and I believe I know what is best for them; and I therefore appeal to you, during the four months when there are no schools in our section, not to make of them loafers, and if they have no means of support not to make of them beggars. Do not force those who have been so unfortunate as to lose their father to gain their living and their support by the toil and the sweat of the brow of their poor widowed mother. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section, after the word "Provided," in line 13, page 3, insert the following: "This act shall not apply to healthy sons of dependent mothers if such sons are over 12 years of age and possess a third-grade school education."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was not born south of Mason and Dixon's line. It came to me from the assistant prosecuting attorney of Schuylkill County, at Pottsville, Pa., to wit, Edward J. Maginnis. It appealed to me so strongly and its argument is so convincing that we should have some exception in this bill along that line that I have offered my amendment in perfect good faith.

If it will not burden you, I want this House to hear what the gentleman says. He deals with boys and criminals. He has prosecuted cases for years up there in Schuylkill County, Pa. Here is what he says:

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
SCHUYLKILL COUNTY,
Pottsville, Pa., January 27, 1916.

DEAR SIR: I address you as one who, I perceive, is working to have Congress pass a just child-labor bill. As one who has given the subject deep study for many years, and as one who has lived his whole life among the class of people who are directly affected by such legislation, let me state that the child-idleness legislation adopted in Pennsylvania has caused awful distress among the following classes of large families among the poor:

1. Fathers incapacitated for labor by sickness or disease.
2. Fathers incapacitated for labor by accident outside of his regular employment.
3. Fathers unable, because of industrial conditions, to obtain employment.

4. Fathers in prison.
5. Mothers and children deserted by faithless fathers.
6. Families large and fathers' wages meager.

And so on.

Under our legislation no help whatever is provided for families in any of the foregoing classes. The distress among them is terrible. I could relate instances indefinitely. The law has taken from these families the right of self-preservation—the right of healthy children to labor when the exigencies of the home demand them to labor—and has given them nothing instead. Candidly, isn't it more in keeping with Christian doctrine to let children labor (under proper conditions) than to send whole families to pauper institutions? I began to labor about the mines when I was 10 years of age, and never afterwards ceased to be a wage earner, because my parents needed my help. I am proud of what I did; why not then leave the same privilege open to the children of the future?

I would respectfully suggest an amendment to the act which would exempt child labor which is performed in order to prevent a family (1) from starving or (2) in order to keep a poor family intact. Believe me that the men and women who advocate these child-labor laws know nothing of the actual conditions that prevail among the poor industrial classes. You must actually live among them to know—for their voices never reach the upper stratas.

I urge you in the name of the millions of Lincolns yet unborn to continue your noble efforts to obtain such amendment to the Keating bill as will leave a vestige of hope for the poor who must labor.

Sincerely, your well-wisher,

E. J. MAGINNIS.

I also wish to submit the following:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE LEGISLATORS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

(By Edward J. Maginnis.)

[Reprinted from the Pottsville (Pa.) Republican, Apr. 1, 1915.]

EVILS OF CHILD-LABOR BILLS.

The chief danger lurking in the majority of the child-labor bills under consideration at Harrisburg arises from the fact that one class of citizens composed principally of cultured men and women of small or no families at all, living in comfort, albeit with good intentions, are attempting to force legislation on the industrial class, composed mostly of humble, stalwart men and women of large families living in contentment, but depending for existence upon their daily wages.

The distinguishing mark of a free government has been that the laws for the people are made by the people. Whenever the opulent and more intellectual element in society succeed in establishing laws that will operate exclusively upon the proletarian class, free government, as Lincoln understood it, ceases and aristocracy rules. Unless we can show that a considerable portion of the people to be affected by this legislation favors its adoption we should, as true members of a free country, defer action until the wishes of the common people are better ascertained.

The writer at much personal expense of time and labor, and because of a natural sympathy for every soul struggling against adversity, has made careful inquiry among the families of the industrial classes and he has been unable to find a single mother of five or more children depending upon the daily wages of the father for sustenance, who approves of any of the proposed measures.

In short, the rich and childless, the old bachelors and maiden ladies, are striving to impose regulations upon the family of the poor man, which the latter does not want.

If thinking, reasonable men of the influential and patriotic class can be got to realize this truth, a powerful protest will assuredly arise against the enactment of such pernicious legislation. No effective protest is yet being heard simply because the ones who will be hurt are not able to make public protest. And even if those good mothers are thus visited with heavier burdens they will suffer on in silence, and the gay world shall little know their agony. Signs of a happy awakening, however, are evident. Here and there great men are beginning to think and speak upon the subject.

On March 23 Supreme Court Justice John P. Elkin, a man possessing the broad vision and soft heart of a real statesman, declared in a public address: "The question of child labor is now being very generally considered. This is a court problem and desires the best thought of thinking people. But in considering this question let us not forget that work is the common lot of mankind. The best men and the best women of the Nation to-day are those who were taught in the school of adversity and were reared to labor with their hands."

Prof. Nearing, of the University of Pennsylvania, has compiled some statistics which are interesting. He says: "Statistics compiled by colleges of America show that the average size of the family of a college graduate is 1.9 children."

As the average family must include at least four children simply to perpetuate the race it requires small argument to show what would happen to this world if all children were constrained to become college graduates. Within a few centuries the earth would become as barren of human life as the moon. Yet we are told in beautiful language that education is the great moral force of the world.

We have a glimmering recollection that the Good Book somewhere says that man was born to labor. Prof. Nearing further states: "The birth rate in Chestnut Hill and Germantown is two and one-half children to the average family (less than in decadent France); in Kensington it is three children to the average family; and in the second ward of Philadelphia it is seven children to the family."

The lesson is startling; the more mankind is inclined to labor the more he begets respect for and obedience to the prime laws of nature. Is it not time for the brilliant ones among the industrial class to become social uplifters and urge the adoption of civil laws that will insure the perpetuation of the families of the educated and wealthy classes? Or, since the poor must assume the major burden of perpetuating the race, would it not be a just regulation to tax every adult man and woman in élite society, say, $1,000 a year for each legitimate child he or she lacks of a normal family of four, and let the proceeds be distributed by the State among the good fathers and mothers of the industrial class who are rearing large families.

At the hearing in the hall of the house at Harrisburg on Wednesday, March 17, a host of club women from various sections of the State appeared and made pathetic pleas in behalf of the child laborer. They spoke as though they believed that the average child is sort of a non-refillable bottle, containing so much energy which when depleted leaves the child a physical wreck. And yet they all, without exception, went on record as being opposed to an eight-hour day for servant girls or domestics.

These good, noble women, upon whom rest the solemn obligation of attending to social affairs of select society, might be obliged to do some of their own housework if perchance their child servants were limited to an eight-hour workday. Are we to understand that working girls are to be forced out of the stores and factories and given the alternative of working unlimited hours as domestics? Does not this circumstance again illustrate the misguided agitation back of the child-labor reform?

And, lest the writer be charged with taking a stand against liberal education of the mind for any person who can possibly afford it, be it noted emphatically that he has an abiding faith in the good men and women of our industrial class that they will never deprive a child of the opportunity to acquire such intellectual training as the child needs or desires. Let the State provide every facility for education; provide board as well as tuition at the State college; offer premiums to the children of the poor who seek higher education; and establish free professional schools for the poor; but then leave it to the wise judgment of our good fathers and mothers to determine whether their children need manual labor as well as education in order to develop their characters.

History, which, by the way, is becoming an obsolete study, teaches that labor and sacrifice in virile youth molded the characters of most of the lovable men and women of fame. "But," the zealous social reformer retorts, "many fathers and mothers exploit their children." True, but why should that fact be a justification for laying harsh restrictions on the parental hand generally. It is a principle of common law that it is better that ninety-nine guilty escape than that one innocent person be punished. Are not our God-loving fathers and mothers of the industrial class deserving of as much consideration as the criminal? Why reverse the principle as to them, and punish the ninety-nine devoted parents in order to catch the one who exploits his or her children. Herod, it is said, put ninety-nine thousand innocent children to death in order to prevent the rearing of One who was to come to teach the dignity of labor; but Herod was a rich man without a large family of his own.

The records show and our police authorities attest that just in the same degree that we have encumbered our law books with unwise child-labor legislation have we increased the work of our juvenile courts and crowded our reform schools. An authority on such matters wrote recently in one of our large dailies: "The breaking up of the social unit—the family—is responsible for the fact that the city of Philadelphia has an army of 10,000 little ones in homes and institutions." Certainly, homes will be broken up when we deny to poor families the God-given right to sustain themselves by labor. Many boys from 12 to 14 years of age are daily brought into our juvenile courts charged with incipient crimes. Invariably it is found that such boys have formed a dislike for school training, but they are willing to work for wages.

Under our present system there is nothing left for the trial judge to do except to send them to reform schools. There they are associated with hundreds of boys all affected with different forms of vice or moral delinquency. The result is, as the writer has often verified, that they return to society a little better educated in books—and crime. How much better for society if these boys could be paroled and put to manual labor under the care of their parents.

None of the proposed child-labor bills contains an exception in favor of this large class of boys. They will not go to school, the social reformer ordains that they shall not work, hence they must become criminals, for idleness leads ever to crime. Why not first call a convention of all the probation officers of the State and get their opinion as to what ought to be done with our incorrigible, truant, and delinquent boys?

Finally, let us present the case of the mothers in such clear light that only the hardened of heart can longer advocate measures that would rob them of the last vestige of hope. When the soldier in war shoots down his brother we decorate him for valor; when the mothers of men sustain the race we strip them of their natural right to the child's help, we put no trust in their sense of honor. Instead of argument let us exhibit the living examples of the cruel consideration which the social reformer grants to our Spartan mothers.

Here are a few pages taken from the book of life; examples which have come under the eye of the writer; examples which are multiplied the country over in all our industrial centers. And be it remembered that the proposed measures, by restricting further the right of the child to labor, will immeasurably increase the miseries here depicted.

And first we take the case of Mrs. O'Brien. Mrs. O'Brien was a religious woman; she read her Bible and learned that it is God's eternal decree that man shall increase and multiply. She had six children, and her husband worked in the mines. The whole family ate well, slept well, sympathized with their less-fortunate neighbors, and obeyed the law. The earnings of the father barely provided for their current needs. One day Mr. O'Brien was stricken down with an incurable malady. The eldest boys were respectively 11 and 13 years of age. They were willing, anxious, and able to work to make up for the loss of their father's wages. But no; it was economically wrong for boys of their tender age to labor in a free country. Hence the family was divided up, one child was sent here, another there, and poor Mrs. O'Brien died of a broken heart.

And there was Mrs. Bolinski. She had eight children, the eldest a girl of 14 and the next a husky boy of 11. Her husband, in a drunken frenzy, committed an aggravated assault on a neighbor and he got two years. Mrs. Bolinski came into court with her brood and bade her husband an affectionate farewell as he was being led to prison. There was much weeping among them, and the older children strove to console the disconsolate mother with assurances that they would go to work and try to fill dad's place. But no; there was no right for them to do heroic things in a great free country erected upon the sacrifices of the hardy pioneers; hence Mrs. Bolinski and her flock were sent to the county almshouse—where there is no education for children. To date no social uplifter has offered her any help.

And Mrs. Davis, too. She had but four children, just enough to entitle her to a place among the families of the elect. She had an unfaithful spouse, and he deserted her and her little ones and fled the jurisdiction. She was able to take in washing, and Johnnie, her eldest boy, could do a man's job. But Johnnie, so an employer told him, was not old enough to be permitted to soil his manly hands in ugly toil; hence Mrs. Davis, in addition to taking in washing, had to do a little begging on the side to preserve the family unity. It went hard on the proud little woman to beg.

And there was noble Mrs. Schmidt. Because of hard times her husband, a tradesman, was unable to get employment. There was plenty of work about that her boys could do, but they could not get employment certificates unless their parents took false oaths. Mrs. Schmidt, fortunately for her, came of a hardy race. She did not go to the poorhouse, but instead took in two washings a day with ironing, and thus kept the table provided while her husband searched the country for a job. It might be added as a detail that the awful strain broke her down in body.

But less the foregoing seem but commonplace recitals of human experience, we will relate the story of Mrs. Haas for the delectation of our pseudo-social reformers. And to avoid all play on the sympathies we will not color any of the details. Last fall her husband became ill and was unable to work. She is the mother of six children, the eldest physically able to work, but prohibited by law. The family income being shut off they were actually starving when a fellow laborer happened in one day. Moved by compassion, the fellow laborer went out and soon returned with three chickens. Within an hour thereafter the chickens were devoured. It was the first substantial food they had eaten in many days. It turned out that the chickens were stolen. As soon as Haas got up from his sick bed he was arrested for receiving stolen goods. He admitted to the court that he and his family had eaten the chickens, knowing them to have been stolen. He was sentenced to serve a year and three months. The family became destitute. The distressed mother was tempted to put her virtue on the block, but she was brave. Kind friends brought the matter to the attention of the court, and after some months her husband was paroled.

Thus hundreds of faithful women are forced by legislation conceived in absolute ignorance of conditions prevailing among the industrial class to sacrifice their bodies, to beg, to retreat to pauper institutions, to sacrifice their lives, to sell their honor, in order to preserve their families.

"Oh," the college professor, the club woman, and the childless philanthropist will exclaim in unison, "the widows' pension and the compensation act will take care of those unfortunate women." The writer challenges anyone to point to a single provision in the statute books of Pennsylvania, or in any of the proposed reform bills, which provides any adequate relief for a mother in any of the circumstances above noted. And yet, if we were humanely inclined, how easy it would be to incorporate a proviso to permit the healthy sons of distressed mothers, say over the age of 12 years, and having a third-grade school education, to work at such manual labor as his home physician would certify that he is able to perform.

Down deep in the hearts of these faithful mothers of large families there is a growing conviction that the world is unconsciously uniting in a giant conspiracy to crush them because of their unbending fidelity to the primary laws of God and nature. In time, slowly it may be, American manhood will awaken to the evils of fanatical legislation, and then we can hope for a return to first principles.

I submit, gentlemen of the House, that we ought not to prevent a mother whose husband has deserted her or is in jail, or a destitute mother who is a widow, from receiving the fruits of the labor of her boys of 12, 13, and 14 years of age. She ought not to be compelled to go to the poorhouse or see her boys go to a reformatory and have the family scattered instead of the boys working in honest toil to help support her. She toiled for them in infancy, and when she becomes worn out from such toil and has no other support, it is noble and just to let her able children labor sufficiently to keep her from suffering.

I appeal to you in behalf of the tired, saddened, dependent mothers.

Now, when the mother is old and helpless, saddened and pauperized, are you going to require that her little family be scattered to other homes; are you going to let them roam the streets and finally land in a house of correction, or are you going to let an able-bodied boy, 12 years old or older, under these circumstances, who has already acquired a third-grade certificate, work for his mother?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I say, there is much more Christian spirit, as my friend says, and there is much more common sense in letting the boy work under these circumstances; and I predict that the boy who is permitted to feel the honorable duty of helping a poor mother with his honest toil will be among the boys who will in the future sit in the Halls of Congress and run your industrial institutions, and such boys will be among your leading men. It will not be the little tramp who goes around the streets in idleness until he is 16 and says, "My mammy and daddy can keep me up, and I don't have to work." The boy who feels the responsibility of working for a widowed mother, who in his infancy protected his life, will make the better man of the two in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman thinks the son of a widowed mother is benefited by having lost his father?

Mr. WEBB. No; I said no such thing as that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said he was in a much better attitude to succeed.

Mr. WEBB. No; I said the boy who felt the responsibility of honest toil to protect a widowed and helpless mother would become a better man than one who, when a boy, was tramping around the streets doing nothing until he was 16 years of age, and experience will prove the truth of what I say.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to modify his statement, because as he made it it plainly was that it would benefit a child to lose his father.

Mr. WEBB. I appeal to the House that I did not say any such thing.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman modifies his remarks, it will be all right.

Mr. WEBB. Listen to this letter from Rev. A. E. Brown, superintendent of the Department of Mountain Missions and Schools of North Carolina, a godly man, who keeps close to our people, knows their habits and their needs:

HOME MISSION BOARD OF THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION,
Asheville, N. C., January 31, 1916.

Hon. E. Y. WEBB, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BROTHER WEBB: I note the position which Congressmen from this State are taking on the child-labor bill before Congress, and I am inclined to give my heartiest approval of this course. I think the employment of children in manufactories should be regulated and supervised by a suitable person. I do not know just how much injury has been done to children by their work in the factories, but I have noticed this, that the children who work in factories are not before our police court to be sentenced to the reformatory. I believe that labor in a measure is a preventive of crime. I think it is a greater problem to know what to do with the boys growing up in our cities and towns without employment than what to do with those who are employed in the factories.

Yours, fraternally, A. E. BROWN, Superintendent.

[Mr. LEWIS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, can we not arrange by unanimous consent to limit the debate on this section? I suggest that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and 5 minutes by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to offer an amendment to the section.

Mr. KEATING. Then let us say in 15 minutes, 5 minutes for the gentleman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, as I did for a similar bill when it passed the last Congress. I do this knowing that many children have worked and will continue to work below the age of the limit fixed by this bill. There is a difference between child work on the farm and work in mines and factories.

I saw a number of children from the Lawrence (Mass.) district when the strike conditions were being investigated by the Committee on Rules of the House. Some of them were there with their parents. In nine cases out of ten the children had violated, either through their guardians or parents, the laws of the State of Massachusetts in order to get into the mills. Their parents admitted in some instances that they had stated to the employers that their children were over 14 years of age so they could get them into the mills. That condition exists throughout the country. I have seen men take their own boys, under 14 years old, into the coal mines and have them work by their side in the mines.

While parents will consent to or permit their children to work in mills or mines, the State—and the Nation, where the State fails—must step in and take care of the child life that is wasted in employments that are ruinous to young life. If this bill was so broad in its scope that it included farm as well as factory and mine work, it would raise a serious question. But as it refers solely to the industries in which it is so ruinous to the child, and while the same parents refuse to exercise that care over their own children that they ought to, the State or the Nation must step in and do it.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. This bill applies to every manufacturing plant in the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; it does not refer to the cotton mills only.

Mr. WEBB. It refers to mills, factories, and manufacturing establishments.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly where children are placed on machines and compelled to work along with the machines, it saps the life out of the children, and it properly applies to all industries of that kind. There may be a small chance for a child in a coal mine where it is not under machine control. There is none in a mill on a machine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day I spoke in opposition to an amendment prohibiting the Department of Labor from appointing employees to enforce this law. Later, during my absence in the Committee on Appropriations on committee work, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] commented upon my enthusiasm for the bill, and suggested that I should attempt to remedy conditions in the State of New York before I attempted to interfere with conditions in his State.

I did not refer to conditions in any State, Mr. Chairman. I favor this bill because of its great fundamental underlying principle and the benevolent purpose sought to be accomplished. If conditions in the State which I represent, in part, were as vicious and as bad as they are in the State of the gentleman from North Carolina, and the Congress of the United States should feel impelled to take up a bill like this one in order to eliminate those conditions, I should be so ashamed of my own State that, rather than attempt to defeat the legislation, I should retire from this House to private life.

It unfortunately is true that evil conditions exist in all communities. Wherever greed is exalted over humanity men will be found indifferent to the proper development of the child so long as pecuniary benefit results from the abuse of children by enforced labor.

Much talk is indulged in about the man from the farm, of the boy of 12 and 14 who, struggling up through youth to manhood, overcomes many obstacles and accumulates wealth and attains high position. Have you ever talked with any of them? Find one who will not regret that conditions had been such and that his life had been cast in environments so unfortunate that he had been deprived of the opportunities he was entitled to as a youth and who does not devote every energy and make every sacrifice to give his own children the privileges and benefits denied to him in his youth. [Applause.]

I have a boy 14 years of age and I have one 12 years of age. God forbid that any legislation would be enacted here which would permit them to go into the quarry or the factory or the mill to support their mother if their natural support were taken away.

Mr. Chairman, we live in a new age and under different conditions than those prevailing 20 or 30 years ago. Conditions in factories and quarries and mines are entirely different from what they were then. Society owes something to the innocent and helpless children. [Applause.] They can no longer in this country be condemned to a life of disease and helplessness and ignorance because through misfortune or accident their natural support is taken away and they are compelled to depend on the efforts and labor of an honorable and honest mother. The State owes something to dependent children, and it is one of the glories of our civilization that legislation is being enacted in recognition of that fact and for the welfare of the young. My State has taken a foremost position in such legislation and has enacted a widow's pension law in order to meet one phase of the problem.

This legislation should not be discussed because of the conditions existing in any one State. I did not intend, in advocating this bill, to refer to conditions in any particular State. Wherever the conditions aimed at exist they should be eliminated. The Federal Government can not completely control the situation; but it can aid in bettering conditions, and this bill will help materially. What chance in the future has the child placed in a mine or quarry under the age of 16 years? Put the child under 14 years of age in a mill for more than eight hours a day, or before 7 o'clock in the morning and after 7 o'clock in the evening, with the speeding-up conditions that exist in such establishments and indicate what chance has he for that physical, mental, and moral development essential to fit him to be a good citizen and a contented human being? Such children are doomed to lives of disease, in most instances to lives of crime, and if, perchance, some one of them, because of unusual conditions, peculiar capacity, and exceptional ability, manages to break through the barrier which surrounds him and climbs successfully the ladder of life it should not be held up as an example for children to emulate, but, rather, we should consider the fate of the great majority, who fail and sink to a lower plane, with the resulting misery, disease, and unhappiness. [Applause.]

This bill deserves to pass. It will help the widespread movement to conserve human life; it will give thousands of children opportunities to contribute to the betterment of mankind who otherwise will be a menace to their fellows.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very well; I will withhold my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WEBB) there were—ayes 8, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 13, page 3, the following:
"Provided, Nothing herein contained shall apply to goods made or prepared by any boys' or girls' canning club existing in any State."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact, well known, I think, to all of the membership, that the Department of Agriculture for a number of years has been encouraging the building up of boys' and girls' canning clubs in the different States of the Union. These canning clubs can vegetables, fruits, and other things of that character, and they ship them into other States for sale. I have offered this amendment solely to protect those canning clubs. If this House thinks that that spirit of enterprise and industry among the boys and girls of the country ought not to be encouraged, of course they will vote down the amendment. I do not care at this time to go into any argument of the merits of the bill, but I think if it is to become a law this exception ought to be made, and I have offered the amendment for that purpose.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will not this amendment open up the door for the organization of these clubs in every community where they desire to violate the law?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not suppose it would create them in communities that want to violate the law. I think they exist in nearly all of the agricultural communities in this country to-day. They are existing now all over the West and all over the South and, I think, in the East and in almost every agricultural community they have their boys' canning clubs and their girls' canning clubs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Might we not be able to add some word to the amendment of the gentleman which would clearly show that if the amendment should be adopted it would be impossible for a corporation to call itself a boys' canning club or a girls' canning club?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am willing to have such an amendment adopted.

Mr. MANN. These boys' clubs are voluntary organizations, not incorporated.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely; but the products which they make do at times ship into other States. I am quite willing to add any word that will protect it from any intentional violation of the law.

Mr. MANN. After the word "club," if you would add the words "not incorporated," I think it might make it safe, so that it could not be used by any company engaged in canning.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I will ask that the words "not incorporated" shall be inserted at the proper place. I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], as I did a moment ago in private conversation, that it is not the intention of those who drafted the bill that it should affect the canning clubs operating under the encouragement of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But it does affect them.

Mr. KEATING. And the gentleman's amendment as he has drafted it, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests, is entirely too broad. It seems to me that it should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture or the three Cabinet officers mentioned in section 3 of this bill, who are to draft rules and regulations.

Mr. MANN. But they could not draft rules and regulations in violation of the act. It looks as though section 1 would cover anything that could be called a cannery.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me read from the bill a moment:

The product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment.

These boys and girls have what they call a cannery, and this language would certainly exclude the products of their cannery.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, would not the words "bona fide canning clubs recognized by the Department of Agriculture of the United States" clear up the meaning of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment which will make it perfectly clear. All I desire to do is to protect these very commendable canning clubs of boys and girls in the agricultural sections of the country.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I sympathize with the gentleman's proposition. The fact is you will now kill the bill with my vote if the proposition is not accepted. In my county we are not operating under the United States Department of Agriculture, but we are operating under the State department of agriculture in our own State, and we have, I think, some twenty-odd voluntary canning clubs, where they can all kinds of farm products.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired on this paragraph and amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Was there an agreement? I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Florida have five minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman from Colorado have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois amends the request of his colleague by asking that the gentleman from Florida have five minutes and the gentleman from Colorado have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOPWOOD. I would like to ask unanimous consent to have five minutes on this matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can get it on the next paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I have asked unanimous consent—and I believe it was granted—to make this proposed amendment read "unincorporated boys' and girls' canning clubs." Now, I want to say, as I have already, to make it plain, that if this legislation is to pass at all—and I assume it will—I am not in favor of it, and I want to be perfectly frank with the House and therefore make that statement. We have upon the statutes in Florida a much better, a more full and complete child-labor law than this; and, in addition, I am one of those who believe that we have not the jurisdiction to engage in this character of legislation. I understand it is labeled a bill to deal with interstate commerce, but that is a mere subterfuge. It is, in fact, a bill to deal with child labor throughout the United States, with which the Congress has nothing to do. And I want right here, Mr. Chairman, as long as I have gotten the time, to relate a statement made to me by a Member of Congress who has passed to his reward—a gentleman whom all the older Members knew and whom, I think, we all loved—an old gentleman about 70 years of age, of magnificent physical proportions. He stated to a number of Members on a certain occasion that he was once a member of the State senate of his State, and he said there was a little doctor, also a member of the senate, who got up a child-labor bill; and he said one day that little doctor made a powerful speech in favor of his child-labor bill, and in the course of his speech, among other things, said "this way of working young children had to stop; it would stunt them, and that they would grow up to be little runts and never would be of any account." Our friend said when the doctor got through he himself took the floor and he said, "Gentlemen, I want you to look at me." He was over 6 feet and weighed about 260 pounds. He said, "I think I am a pretty good specimen of a man, and I do not remember the day when I was not working." He said he then sat down, and the little doctor came again. "Well," said the little doctor, "if it did not tell on you it will tell on your children, and they will be little runts and dwarfs and never amount to anything." My friend said, "I knew they did not know anything about my family, and when the doctor got through I took the floor again and I said, 'Gentlemen, I haint got but two children in the world, and they are both boys. One of them weighs 260 ponnds and the other weighs 340; and if I had not been stunted by work when I was young the Lord only knows what they would have been.'" [Laughter and applause.]

I look upon all this talk as being sickeningly sentimental, with nothing else to it; but if you are going to adopt it, if you are going to say that the boys of this country shall not grow up strong, rugged, fully capable of making their way in the world, as they have in the past, then I ask you to put this amendment in the bill, and at least protect the little boys and girls who are engaged in gardening and in canning the fruits of their labor and trying to learn something which will be useful to them in after life. Tell me that a boy ought not to work, that it is ruinous to him? Look at the men on this floor; look at the men at the other end of the Capitol; a great majority of them came not from the lap of luxury; and I want to say if I had my right to-day to will to my two boys when I die $100,000 or a million dollars apiece, I do not know of anything worse on earth that could happen to them. They ought to work. The scripture says, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, the Southern States have been quite severely criticized in the course of discussion upon this bill because, forsooth, some of us from that section are still loyal to the Constitution of the land in both letter and spirit. We have been painted as inhumane and with no kindly interest in the children of this country. I do not care to criticize others, but if I lived in New York, Boston, or other large cities in the North where I have seen small boys—much below 14 years of age—thinly clad, ragged, and almost barefooted, trudging through the snow and ice and shivering in the winter winds as they cried their newspapers in an effort to earn a few pennies with which to buy bread, I hardly think I should have the supreme nerve to set myself up as a teacher of the most humane method of rearing children.

What do the advocates of this bill propose to do with children under 14 years of age after they have denied them the privilege of earning a dollar by honest toil? Who will care for and support those whose parents are unable to care for and support them? What will become of those who have no parents and no property? Will the law which denies to them the privilege to earn an honest living by light toil make provision for their support? What will become of them? Perhaps these very humane gentlemen, who seem to delight in lecturing us on our cruel treatment of children, prefer that they shall be brought up in poverty, indolence, and idleness, which invariably leads to crime, rather than have them taught to be industrious in youth, which invariably leads to independence in maturer years. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe a case can be found in all the world where moderate labor ever proved either mentally or physically injurious to a child. "Idleness is the devil's storehouse," with the boy as well as with the man. "As the twig is bent so is the tree inclined," and if you bring up a boy, rich or poor, in idleness, ninety-nine times out of a hundred he will not be worth a "tinker's damn" to himself or the community when he becomes a man. If employers of child labor are oppressive and inhuman, punish such employers and regulate child labor along humane lines; but do not deny to the poor boy, perhaps alone in the world, the chance to carve out his own fortune by honest labor and write his name high on the scroll of fame, as so many before him have done. Give him a chance in the race of life, and do not hamper him with misfit legislation born of a sickening sentimentality which has no place in a Government like ours.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a few moments ago it was not the intention of the men who drafted this bill that it should apply to the so-called boys' and girls' canning clubs, and yet if you begin to place exemptions in this bill I think you will very seriously weaken it. This particular amendment is offered by a gentleman who avows his opposition to the bill, his anxiety to defeat the bill. I believe under the circumstances that the House will act wisely if it rejects his amendment. I do not believe that any proper interpretation of the law will interfere with the operation of any legitimate boys' and girls' canning club.

Mr. CLARK or Florida. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think a cannery would include a boys' and girls' club?

Mr. KEATING. No; not a boys' and girls' canning club. A cannery has a very definite meaning.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit a further question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What possible harm would it do?

Mr. KEATING. As the gentleman has drafted his amendment any club called a boys' and girls' canning club may get its output into interstate commerce. It would be the simplest thing in the world to crawl through that particular loophole and violate the law.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. We have in my district community canneries, where the farmers in the vicinity come together and can their products, and in that way use the labor of their children, no doubt some of them under 14 years of age. They carry these to the wholesale grocery houses and in that way get a market for canned goods of that kind. Of course, some goes into interstate commerce in Oklahoma and New Mexico. Does the gentleman think that the bill would cover cases of that kind?

Mr. KEATING. I do not believe that children should be worked in canneries. That is the provision of this bill, and I believe that provision should be retained, and that we should not put into the bill weakening exemptions. I trust the House will vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "club" and inserting in parentheses the word "unincorporated."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I got consent to include the word "unincorporated" just before the word "boys," to read "unincorporated boys' and girls' clubs."

Mr. MANN. I did not know that consent had been granted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. I would like to ask the Clerk to read the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to amend by striking out——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I made the request some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Florida that the gentleman did make that request, but in the confusion the Chair did not put it; but, if the gentleman from Florida desires, the Chair will put the request now. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out, after the word "club," the words "existing in any State," and insert the word "unincorporated."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two minutes remaining.

Mr. KEATING. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Children can not manufacture products and sell them. If these children's canneries are to be unincorporated, who will make the contracts with purchasers and with carriers, and who will receive and pay out the money? If these canneries are not incorporated, they must be partnerships or something of that kind. Who is to do the business for the children if they are to ship goods in interstate commerce?

Mr. MANN. They not only can a great many goods but sell them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They can not make a legal contract.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They can not make a legal contract, but the man who wants to work children can make such a contract. In my judgment the pending amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 4——

The CHAIRMAN. Page 2 is not now under consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Wherever the gentleman's amendment came in. I did not hear the page.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 3, line 13.

Mr. HOWARD. After page 3, line 13.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13, insert "Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to bona fide boys' and girls' canning clubs recognized by the agricultural departments of the several States and of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia for the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOWARD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 9.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as a substitute.

The amendment as a substitue was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That any person who violates any of the provisions of section 1 of this act, or who refuses or obstructs entry or inspection authorized by section 3 of this act, shall for the first offense be punished by a fine of not more than $200 and for each subsequent offense shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than three months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no dealer shall be subject to conviction under the provisions of this act who shall establish a guaranty issued by the person by whom such goods were manufactured or produced, resident in the United States, to the effect that in the manufacture and production of such goods, neither in whole nor in part, had children been employed or permitted to work in any mine or quarry under the age of 16 years, or in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment under the age of 14 years, or between the ages of 14 years and 16 years who worked more than eight hours in any one day or more than six days in any one week or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m., and in such event the guarantor shall be amenable to any prosecution, fine, or penalty to which the person seeking the protection of such guaranty would otherwise have been subject under the provisions of this act. Said guaranty, to afford the protection above provided, shall contain the name and address of the person giving the same.

Also, the following committee amendments were read:

Page 3, line 14, strike out the figure "5" and insert "6."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 3, line 16, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In answer to an argument on the other side of the House against this bill, founded upon a letter received from Pennsylvania, I am brought to my feet as a Member from Pennsylvania to say a few words in favor of the bill, and in answer to that argument.

Pennsylvania has the most advanced laws, I think, or as advanced, as any State in the Union on all questions pertaining to children. In the first place, our educational laws are among the best in the United States. We have erected the finest school buildings and we have the largest percentage of attendants, and we have the best care of our children in an educational sense that any State can have.

Our mining laws in Pennsylvania are among the most advanced of any State in the Union. I happen to live in a mining section. I represent a mining district in the coke and coal regions in southwestern Pennsylvania. In the past 25 years the mining laws of that State have added to the welfare of those people, so that you would not recognize their homes if you had seen them 25 years ago and would see them now, by reason of the advanced legislation that has allowed them to have these fine homes, surrounded by green fields, fine gardens, and flowers, and everything that makes life comfortable and pleasant.

The child-labor law of Pennsylvania is one of the most advanced in the Union, and that that child-labor law has in any way prevented the people of Pennsylvania, the widows of Pennsylvania, as was said here, from the best to which they are entitled, the best things in this land for usefulness and happiness, is not correct. We have the best laws or as good laws as are in the United States in regard to the care of the indigent poor. We have poor-farms on which they are cared for.

We have a system of outdoor relief, where a family that wants to live together and does not want to be sent to the poor farm, whereby the widow and her children are cared for in their own homes. So that the lady who wrote the letter referred to is entirely misinformed in regard to Pennsylvania.

I just wanted to answer that stricture on Pennsylvania, and to say that Pennsylvania is in favor of every advancement that can be had for the protection of the children. I am in favor of the enactment of this law as an additional law to make the States that are not coming up and marching with the other States of the Union—only a few of them are lagging behind—toe the mark, and march along with equal step. It will keep the products of the child labor of such States out of Pennsylvania and other States which are willing to take care of their children as they should be cared for, and will give them the opportunity which they ought to have without being compelled to compete with the child labor of such States as still insist on the employment of such labor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, in the report of the committee on this bill, on page 7, this statement appears:

It was evident through this testimony that the only opposition from manufacturers personally appearing before the committee has been from the cotton-manufacturing sections of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Alabama, and that the manufacturing associations of these States have been in the past opponents before their own State legislatures of the raising of the age limit or shortening of the hours for the working children.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a copy of the resolutions which were adopted by the Cotton Manufacturers' Association of South Carolina on January 22, 1909. I read:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE COTTON MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Resolved, That the association renews its recommendation to the legislature that there be passed a general compulsory education law requiring the compulsory education of children under 14 years of age.

Resolved, That provided there be passed such compulsory education law this association feels that there is no objection to advancing under proper limitations and restrictions the age limit of children working in textile mills and other industries to an age to comply with the general compulsory education law as passed.

Resolved, That this association also renews its strong and urgent recommendation to the legislature that a law be passed in this State requiring registration of births and marriage licenses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those resolutions were presented and read before the committee of the South Carolina Legislature and repeatedly presented to that body. They were sent to me by one of the leading cotton manufacturers in the South, Capt. E. A. Smyth, of the Pelzer Mills. I believe he is the largest manufacturer in the South to-day of cotton goods. I believe if the report of the committee throughout is no more reliable than the statement which I have quoted from it, it must be taken with a good deal of salt.

I know that the Manufacturers' Association of our State has been in favor since 1909 of a child-labor law, but the legislature has not passed it. I wish to have these resolutions printed as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. AIKEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I am not a lawyer, I claim to have a reasonable amount of common sense, and some one has said that law is, or should be, based on common sense.

I can conceive of the National Government prohibiting the use of the mails for the conduct of a lottery between States, for gambling in itself is an evil subject to police regulation. I can conceive of the National Government forbidding the carrying of girls or immoral women from one State to another, affording the States some protection against the immoral practices of citizens of other States. I can conceive of the ever-ready interstate commerce act being called into play to suppress the illicit sale of whisky. These all come within the scope of police regulations and find justification in the right of the National Government to protect one State against those immoral or illegal practices that the citizens of another State would inflict upon it. But that the National Government should prohibit the shipping of a bolt of cloth, or a sewing machine, or a box of shoes, or a suit of clothes from one State to another or to an alien country because children under the age of 16 years may have aided in their manufacture is stretching the inhibitions of interstate commerce beyond the limit.

I am opposed to the pending bill because it undertakes to usurp a duty that belongs exclusively to the States and that the States can perform more satisfactorily than the National Government can.

North and South Carolina, New Mexico, and Wyoming have been cited as the only States in the Union where a child under 14 years of age can be legally admitted to factory work. The State legislature, through the efficient service of its department of commerce and labor, is handling this question more intelligently and satisfactorily to employer and employee alike than the National Government could possibly handle it.

I can not lose sight of the fact that any interference with the right of a parent to put his child to work at such age as he may deem wise, if that labor is necessary for the support of the family, is in a measure subversive of the individual rights of the citizen. The parent is the natural guardian of the child, and it is reasonable to suppose that, except in rare instances, he is not going to impose labor on his child unless poverty or stern necessity impels it. But if there are some abuses, and I admit there are, the State is nearer to its own citizens and is better qualified to take on itself paternal obligations than the Nation. We want no Federal agents going through our mills and mill villages telling our people when their children shall go to work and when they shall not, and telling our men and women how many hours they may work per day and how many not.

And why apply the provisions of a Federal act to children of mill operatives? Why not the children of lawyers, farmers, merchants, or other professions or callings? I can readily conceive of the employees in manufacturing plants feeling righteous indignation at this effort of the Federal Government to supervise their private affairs.

With the State the feeling is different. We are a homogeneous people, of one blood and of a common interest. Our people have accepted such laws as the State legislature has passed as being for the common good, and employer and employee are working hand in hand through the State legislature, slowly but surely, for the permanent betterment of labor. Any effort to standardize labor and wages through a Federal act, even if it were constitutional, which it can not be, must fail. What might suit New York, for instance, might not suit South Carolina at all. A large per cent of the labor of the North is of foreign lineage, if not actually foreign. In the South we are of one blood, one interest, and whatever may be the necessity for Federal supervision of labor in the North, there is no such necessity in the South. The Southern States are not going to lay unreasonable demands on any of its citizens, and such demands as it does make for the good of society will be administered humanely and with every consideration for the rights of the individual.

This Federal child-labor bill, grafted, as it were, on an entirely foreign and irrelevant act of Congress, is inconsistent in its very title, to wit, "A bill to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor." If it should pass, it could be made operative only by putting a Federal agent in every mill village in the South, for who could tell by inspection whether a bolt of cloth was manufactured wholly or in part by child labor?

Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with those little ones, even of the age of 14 years, who must rise early in the morning and stand at the post of duty until day has faded into night. But I realize that all of our people are comparatively poor, and there are few southern families, without as well as within our mills, in which children do not work some. I realize that beyond 14 years the child can take on labor without materially impairing his growth, and I know that the southern parent, except in the rarest instance, is not going to impose work on his or her children, except as necessity or duty prompts. We are solving this problem satisfactorily. We are solving it in the light of conditions that this National Government can not adapt itself to. We are solving it with the interests of all of our people at heart. I feel sure, then, that it would be a mistake for the National Government to interfere, if it had the right, and I feel even more sure that it has absolutely no right in the premises.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it has been stated or not, but it should be said that the cotton manufacturers of North Carolina were the first great body of business men to advocate compulsory education in North Carolina.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to sum up briefly my arguments against this bill. What I have done I have done from conscience. I believe I am trying to save the great distinguishing feature of this Republic. Other republics have risen and fallen, because no republic in the past had that splendid balance that we have of State sovereignty on the one side and national sovereignty on the other.

The regulation of the morals and the health of the people for 125 years has been left wisely to the States, as was intended by the framers of the Constitution. This is one of the cases covered in this bill that should be likewise left to the States and constitutionally belongs to them, and where it has always been heretofore. Whenever you unbalance our splendid system of government and let the National Government absorb all these multifarious things that have been heretofore done by the people themselves in their States and localities then you will have a vast government that will ultimately fall of its own weight.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I am a new Member. Do I understand that the gentleman introduced the national prohibition resolution or bill?

Mr. WEBB. I did. I will say to my friend that there is no analogy between that and this bill. That bill leaves to the States themselves the amendment of their constitution in an orderly and a constitutional way, but this bill is a proposition to take charge, by mere congressional act, of the rules and regulation of labor connected with manufacturing in 48 States, in 299,000 manufacturing plants.

My chief objection to this bill, Mr. Chairman, is that, in my opinion, it is flagrantly and obviously unconstitutional. I would not be bold enough to say that if I were the only man who had said it, but the great lawyers who composed and headed the Committee on the Judiciary in times past, including Judge Jenkins, of Wisconsin, and Judge Birdsall, of Iowa, and Judge Parker, of New Jersey, and Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, and Judge De Armond, of Missouri, all members of the great Judiciary Committee seven years ago, had this same matter before them and unanimously reported that it was unconstitutional. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary at the same time, containing, as I recall, as members Senator Root and Senator Knox, of Pennsylvania, made the same report—that the bill was unconstitutional because the Congress of the United States had no power to regulate the hours of labor of women and children wholly within a State, which this bill undertakes to regulate.

Again, I am opposed to this bill, because I do not believe a Federal bureau here in Washington to supervise and look after the administration of this law can be as well trusted to administer properly the labor laws of 299,000 manufacturing plants that are scattered all over the 48 different States of the Union as the people of those 48 States.

I am opposed to the bill also because under it you have two sets of morals. You say it is immoral or wrong to circulate in interstate commerce goods made by child labor in the United States, but you do not exclude the products of the labor of children in Panama, or in Hawaii, or in other parts of the world. They can come in and circulate at liberty in our interstate-commerce channels. In addition, this bill will not affect the products of child labor to be shipped into foreign countries. It will not affect the industries of Massachusetts or New Jersey or North Carolina or South Carolina or any other seaboard State engaged in manufacturing goods to be shipped to foreign countries. We have here two or three standards of morals. If it is wrong for one State to receive child-labor goods made in another State, it is wrong to use goods made anywhere by child labor. Why not exclude all child-made goods from interstate-commerce channels in the United States? I offered a proposition to that effect, but you voted it down; and your Republican floor leader, Mr. MANN, voted against my amendment. I do not know if you will be able, when you go back to your constituents, to satisfactorily tell them why you made such a discrimination in favor of foreign-made child-labor products as against manufacturers of this country who use the labor of children only 14 to 16 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—although I do not intend to object—I think we might be able to agree upon a time when the debate on this section should close—say, in 25 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have some time. I will not take more than six minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Make it 26 minutes, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 26 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 26 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. I shall probably not consume the five minutes allotted to me, because I have about finished what I wanted to say.

There is still another objection to the bill, and that is that in order to punish the four States which have been under such constant discussion here you gentlemen are willing to penalize the 275,000 manufacturing plants of the United States. This bill does not apply alone to cotton mills, canneries, and quarries, but it applies to all the manufacturing establishments in the country, and you are willing to require those 275,000 manufacturing plants to put upon every rake, pitchfork, digger, wheelbarrow, package of canned goods, bolt of cloth, and every other one of the million different things that are manufactured in the United States a pure "child-labor" certificate, certifying that they are not made with the child labor denounced in this bill, before any dealer will be willing to handle those articles. Now, gentlemen, we have heard much talk about the odiousness of putting stamps on checks. Stamping checks will not be a marker, it will be only a mild zephyr compared to a Kansas cyclone, to the labor and expense to which the innocent manufacturers of this country, if you please to call them that, will be subjected in putting upon the articles which they manufacture the millions upon millions of stamps which will be required before those articles can be moved in interstate commerce. The average manufacturer does not understand that he has got to do that in order to make two or three States, that are rapidly coming up to the standard, come up to it at once.

I object to the bill again and lastly because there is no provision in it which will permit a big, strapping 12-year-old, or 13, 14, or 15-year-old boy to work for a destitute or pauperized mother. You may talk all you please about sentimentality. I have a boy 11 years old, and I want him to work. I would be willing to have him work in a cotton mill rather than to run about the streets and learn bad habits and hear the vulgar stuff that is often dished out in his presence by older men. The president of one of the best cotton mills in this country, a man whom I know, put his boy in the mill, when school was not going on, when the boy was just 12 years old, to keep him out of the bad company that he would encounter running around town doing nothing. I tell you, gentlemen, we are letting a false sentimentality work upon us and force us into doing an impracticable and improper thing, in my opinion.

In this connection I want to put in the RECORD the labor laws of North Carolina:

No child under 12 to work in any factory or manufacturing establishment within this State. No child between 12 and 13 to work in a factory except as apprentice, and then only after having attended school four months in preceding 12 months.

Sixty hours shall constitute a week's work in all factories and manufacturing establishments, and no minor or woman shall be worked in such factory or establishment more than that length of time, and no adult male to be worked therein longer than that time per week, unless a written contract entered into between him and employer, under terms of which he shall receive extra compensation for extra hours. No employee in any factory or establishment to work exceeding 11 hours a day. This section not to apply to engineers, firemen, superintendents, overseers, section and yard hands, office men, watchmen, or repairers of breakdowns.

Parents of children hiring them to factory or manufacturing establishment to furnish written statement of age of child and certificate of school attendance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that it has been stated by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. WEBB] that this bill is flagrantly and boldly unconstitutional, I want to call attention to the fact that no lawyer upon the floor of this House has attempted to prove its unconstitutionality, except those who come from States affected by its provisions. I have the highest respect for the learning, ability, and conscientiousness of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and the equally distinguished gentleman from Virginia, who have contended against the constitutionality of this bill; but in view of the fact I have just stated, I hope I may be pardoned in saying I am convinced that their judgment is somewhat warped by their surroundings.

In such time as has been permitted to me I have made a careful study with reference to the constitutional questions involved in this bill. I have also at various times given much study to the general principles which involve control by the Government under such circumstances as this bill will cover, and I have come to the abiding conclusion that this bill is constitutional. The objections that have been made to its constitutionality have been for the most part, as it seems to me, disposed of, but there are one or two remaining of which no particular mention has been made, and they have been insisted upon so vociferously by gentlemen who are opposed to the bill that I wish to devote just a few moments to them.

One was mentioned by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] who has just spoken. He has insisted that it is not the business of the Government, and that the Government has no right to take into consideration questions which relate purely to the morals and health of the citizens of some particular State. Yet those questions, as it seems to me, are entirely and completely disposed of by the lottery cases, which relate to the morals of the State, and by the pure-food laws, which pertain to the health of the State.

It remains possibly to be determined as to whether the Government may go one step further and, through its power over interstate commerce, undertake to regulate transportation which is in aid of anything that injuriously affects the public welfare or the public morals. This is the gist of the principle which controls and makes constitutional the provisions of this act.

That principle, in my opinion, has been affirmed recently in the white-slave cases.

Inasmuch as it has been so positively asserted here on this floor that no act has been held constitutional when the transportation inhibited by its provisions did not injuriously affect the people of the State into which such transportation came, I wish to say that if that principle was carried to its logical conclusion the white-slave act would be shorn of most of its power. It is true that the principal object of the white-slave act, or at least one important object which was probably in the mind of the author of that act, was to prevent injury to the morals of the community into which some person was taken for purposes of prostitution or lewdness; but the white-slave act has been applied over and over again to cases where the persons transported and the parties who engaged in the inhibited transportation had no intention to affect, and never would in the least degree have affected, either the morals, the conscience, or the feelings of the community into which they came, because they carried on their proceedings in perfect secrecy, so far as that community was concerned. The only harm was to the morals and the welfare of the community where the transportation originated, just as in this case the general welfare of the community where the transportation originates will be injured if this particular traffic is permitted to be carried on. In both cases the act of transportation was not injurious in itself, but only because it was used as an instrument in aid of the injurious act. And I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by saying that this act is justified because it refuses longer to permit interstate commerce to be used as an instrument for carrying on, aiding, and affecting business operations which are inimical to the welfare and health of the producers.

Mr. Chairman, it would not seem necessary to say anything in support of the merits of the bill. With a few exceptions, those who have opposed it have admitted that its purpose was useful and the results of its enactment would be of great aid in social unlift. Being unable to attack the bill upon its merits, some have sought refuge in its alleged unconstitutionality, and some have even gone so far as to assert that if a Member had had any doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill he ought, as a matter of duty, vote against it. This, Mr. Chairman, is an extreme position and states a principle which, I trust, will never be followed by this House in voting upon any bill. The logical effect of such a rule would be to transform those provisions of our Constitution, whose doctrines we find somewhat difficult to define or whose application somewhat in doubt, into absolute prohibition wherever such doubt arises. Such questions, to my mind, should be decided with the broader view. I concede that the States have certain rights upon which we ought not to infringe, but in determining what those rights are we ought to hold the scales in equal balance and only let them fall upon that side which has the weight of the better reasoning. In so weighing these questions we ought also to take into consideration the purpose and object of our Government, the needs of society, and the axiomatic rule that power and control must vest somewhere, and if it be not found in the States must necessarily belong to the General Government. That there is a crying need for such legislation is doubted by few and affirmed by all of the best thinkers upon the subject. No more important legislation can come before this body than that which aims to protect, improve, and build up the mind and the health of the youth of this Nation, and moved by such considerations I unhesitatingly urge the passage of this bill.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the discussions of this question as to the constitutionality of this bill. We find that there are a number of men of eminence in the law who have been quoted as saying this bill is unconstitutional. I find there is another large number who say it is not unconstitutional. I am not a lawyer. I am willing to take the advice of lawyers on the subject, but as there seems to be a division of opinion as to its constitutionality, then, if we are going to err, for God's sake, let us err on the side of humanity. [Applause.] Let us pass the bill. And if some court declares it unconstitutional, let it do so, but let us not stand here in an attitude of fear as to what the court will do and refuse to do the thing that ought to be done.

I was not in at the time a gentleman read a letter from some one up in Pennsylvania protesting against this bill. I want to say here, being a Representative from Pennsylvania, that this is not the feeling of the employers over there. For 40 years I have been active in labor matters, for years almost constantly on conferences over in Pennsylvania and other States in the iron industry where we met each year, with millions of capital represented on one side of the table and hundreds of thousands of men with families directly and indirectly represented on the other side. We talked our matters over, talked over the conditions of employment, talked over the conditions of labor, and I never found along the employers a desire to enslave child labor. Their contention has always been, and rightfully, too, that they ought to be protected against States making the same material using child labor; they expected that protection. It is up to the United States Government through its Congress to give that protection to the States that have already passed laws protecting the children. We do not care anything about what they do in their own State, if they do not come over the line, but when they come over the line where we are trying to give the children better conditions, we say it is time to cry "Halt."

I have heard a lot of talk about men coming up from the bottom. I am not a good example for pity, not any better than the gentleman from Florida referred to when speaking of the people who are ill treated in youth. I started early—I am sorry I had to do so, for I have felt the loss of a chance to go to school all my life—and it has been my endeavor in all the time I have been in labor circles, and the endeavor of all men who are interested in the labor movement, to try and get a better condition for the children who are to grow up than we had ourselves. [Applause.] That is what we are talking for now and that is what this bill intends to do. The bill is going to pass. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman who spoke about letting in things from abroad made by child labor, that that is true, because his side of the House will not agree to protect us against child-made merchandise coming from abroad. But let us pass this bill, so that we can protect ourselves and our children against the Southern States, where they have no restrictions on child labor, and the next Congress, the Sixty-fifth Congress, will see to it, by a tariff bill that will protect, that there will not be any child-made labor goods coming in from abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It has been said on this floor that a large number of prominent men have come from poor families and had to work at an early age, but that does not prove that useful and prominent men are not coming forward now and will be in the future with a higher age limit and a better labor condition. But it is true, to my mind, that more boys who were given the chance of an education before being compelled to become wage earners will be of prominence and of value to their country than where the reverse has been the condition. There is this to be said in favor of child-labor legislation since it has been enacted, that with each succeeding census the stature of man seems to be increasing and their longevity extended.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. He seemed to be fearful that the enactment of this bill into law would result in undue centralization of power in the National Government; and yet if this bill shall become a law, practically all the powers of government that touch the family and social life and the ordinary business relations of the people will still remain with the States. The States will continue to make the laws which govern the purchase and sale of property, the forms of conveyance, the descent of property, marriage and divorce, the protection of personal liberty, the distribution of estates, the making of wills—in other words, all which affects the people in their intimate personal relations will abide with the State even if the pending bill should become a law.

The gentleman from North Carolina cited the fact, which he seemed to think important, that some years ago the Judiciary Committee of the House declared a bill similar to this to be unconstitutional. But this fact is not decisive of our duty respecting the pending measure; for it has happened more than once that the Supreme Court of the United States has reversed decisions of distinguished judges as to the true interpretation of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. And before permitting that committee opinion to cause us to surrender our own convictions that the pending bill is constitutional and ought to pass it will be well to recall an interesting and instructive fact respecting the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gibbons against Ogden, the leading case touching the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and the power which it grants to Congress. Members will recall that the Legislature of the State of New York had by law granted to Livingston and Fulton the exclusive right, for a term of years, to navigate steamboats on the navigable waters within the jurisdiction of that State, and that the power of the State to grant this exclusive right was sustained by the very eminent Chancellor Kent, author of Kent's Commentaries, in an elaborate decision declaring the unanimous judgment of the highest court of that State. But when the case reached the Supreme Court of the United States, Chief Justice Marshall, in an immortal opinion, ground the Livingston-Fulton contention and the logic of Chancellor Kent's opinion into dust.

But what would have happened to the United States of America if the men of that day had merely pointed to the decision of Chancellor Kent and his associates, surrendered their own convictions, and insisted that the case should go no further? And here I pause to say what this bit of history powerfully suggests—that the Supreme Court of the United States demands not men who are mere worshipers of the dusty precedents of the books but men who combine with great knowledge of the law the forethought, the soul, the imagination of the statesman. [Applause.]

Several of the opponents of the bill have said that if we enact it into law it would afford a precedent for Congress to do many foolish things. For example, they ask, what would prevent Congress from declaring that no goods manufactured by one-armed men could go through the channels of interstate commerce? Now, it is a sufficient answer to this sort of argument to say that the fact that Congress might do a foolish thing is not at all an argument to show that Congress has not the constitutional power to do it. This afternoon the two Houses of Congress could, under the power granted by the Constitution, declare war against every other nation on the globe. It has such power but will not exercise it. The fact that in exercising a power Congress might do a very foolish thing does not prove that the power does not exist.

The gentleman from North Carolina says that this bill, if enacted into law, would not obstruct the coming in of goods manufactured by child labor in Europe. But as a Democrat he has no business to rise on this floor or elsewhere and contend for the enactment of a law for the specific purpose of preventing child-made European goods coming in here, because his party platform declares that Congress has no constitutional power to pass a law for the purpose of protecting an American industry. The Republican Party is the party of protection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Democratic Party maintains that laws to restrict the importation of foreign goods must be for the purpose of obtaining revenue only, with an accent on "only."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, in listening to the arguments of these gentlemen who have so eloquently pleaded that this law is unconstitutional I am reminded of the remark which I think Madam Roland made during the French Revolution: "O Liberty! Liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!" So far as the constitutionality of this bill is concerned, nobody could discuss it in five minutes, but the other day during the very eloquent remarks of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] I interrupted him to ask him if this bill were not similar to the pure food and drugs act. He said then that the difference between that act and this bill, so far as its bearing upon the decision of the Supreme Court as to the constitutionality of the food and drugs act was concerned, was that the Supreme Court decided that act to be constitutional because the things prohibited by that act were deleterious to the human family. Mr. Chairman, if it is deleterious to the human family, it is deleterious at the place where it is ultimately consumed. It it not deleterious at the place of manufacture, it is not deleterious in its transportation, and if it is constitutional because it happens to be deleterious at its destination, I can not conceive of any difference between a product deleterious at its destination and one deleterious at its source. In other words, if Congress has the right to prevent the shipment of an article in interstate commerce because it may endanger some one's anatomy when it gets to its destination, it has the same right to regulate and prevent interstate commerce of an article if it endangers some one in its manufacture and production.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] again said that he was against this bill because it infringed upon the rights of the States. Mr. Chairman, I believe in State rights, but I do not believe in State wrongs, and I will not vote here to protect any State wrong any more than I would vote to infringe upon the right of any State; but I am getting a little tired, a little impatient, every time some legislation comes up in this House, which is for the benefit of humanity and the progress and enlightenment of our Nation, of hearing the standpats on both sides of the Chamber hide behind an antiquated interpretation of the doctrine of State rights. [Applause.] I am not—and I am glad that I am not—one of those Democrats who believes that this great Nation of ours is a monster. If I believed that the Federal Government, of which I am a part, and that the flag to which I owe allegiance was the flag of a cruel, monstrous Government, I would leave it. I would go to Germany and join Von Hindenberg's army or go to England and become a baron. [Laughter.] I would not stay here.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt in my mind of the constitutionality of this law nor of its desirability as a matter of public policy. Congress a few years ago passed a bill known as the insecticide law to protect bugs and ants and grasshoppers from having their rights infringed upon with insecticide. Was there anything in that law that involved its constitutionalty because it might kill a bug or a grasshopper or a lizard or a worm of some kind in an unconstitutional manner? I have greater regard for the boys and girls of this Nation than I have for the grasshoppers and June bugs, and as my good friend from Georgia the other day said, if there is any doubt at all about the constitutionality of the law upon which we are about to vote, and which I am glad to say we are about to pass, I am willing so to vote that the boys and girls of this Nation may receive the benefit of that vote, because there is nothing in all this world that is sadder than a girl without a girlhood or a boy without a boyhood. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the word "dealer" or the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to include any individual or corporation or the members of any partnership or other unincorporated association. The term "ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce" as used in this act means to ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 4, line 17, strike out the figure "6" and insert the figure "7."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 24, on page 4, add the following:
"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall apply to any State of the Union whose legislature has already enacted legislation relating to child labor."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, can we make an agreement in reference to limiting debate?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I only want two or three minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I ask unanimous consent that debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair did not know as to the division of debate, and he recognizes the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I only want three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I have offered this amendment, as I did the other amendments that I offered, in the utmost of good faith. I want to repeat what I said a while ago, that the State of Florida, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, has a more complete child-labor law than this proposed enactment. We feel, Mr. Chairman, that under our peculiar form of government we have the absolute right to deal with the question for ourselves. We have dealt with it, and there is not a State in this Union—North, South, East, or West—that has dealt with it in a more enlightened manner than we have in the State of Florida. Our children are protected there as well as they are protected in any State within the broad confines of this Republic, and I do not care in what section of the Union you find it.

Mr. Chairman, our educational laws will compare favorably with the educational laws of any State of this Union. We have spent as much money per capita for education as any of them, and we go as far as any of them in the matter of conserving the childhood of the State. We regard it as a matter peculiarly within the State jurisdiction; and if it is not within the province of the State to legislate upon it, why do these gentlemen name this child an "interstate-commerce" regulation? It is not an interstate-commerce regulation. It is not intended for that. It was intended to regulate child labor in this Republic, and why do not these gentlemen give it the proper name? In my judgment it is simply because they know that the Congress has no jurisdiction to handle the question of child labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I have seen the Constitution of the United States cuffed about so much on this floor during the past eight years that, not being a lawyer, I have about reached the conclusion that there is some doubt about the constitutionality of the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.] Whenever a matter of great moment comes on the floor of this House, those who oppose it are very much given to hiding behind the fear of its unconstitutionality. Possibly it may be; but in that event there is always a court of last resort, and they have their recourse there. But really, it seems to me that such a question as that ought not to figure largely in a matter of so much concern to humanity's welfare as that of child labor. Some statistician has figured out that it costs an average of $3,000 to bring a boy from babyhood to manhood, to clothe him, to educate him, to doctor him, to make a man of him; and it costs a whole lot more than that. It costs the average father many short meals and long hours, and it costs the mother many sleepless nights, pain and anguish, heartaches, and all of that in order to bring up that boy to be a man. And yet under the conditions which prevail in this country in many places, despite the sacrifices which are made by the parents, we bring children up to manhood defective in physical organism and mentally unprepared to meet the battle of life. I believe as firmly as that I stand here that the innocent child's blood that bespatters so many windowpanes in the factories of this country is a stain upon the character of every legislative authority in this country which tolerates it, and it ought to be abolished. I do not know what the Constitution may do about it; but as for me, Constitution or no Constitution, I am in favor of providing for the childhood of this country the largest possibility for growing up into a vigorous, sturdy, and responsible citizenship, and this bill will help to that triumph. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, during the past year I have noticed a great deal of criticism by eastern magazines relative to the child-labor proposition in the Southern States, and I have listened to-day with much interest to the debate about taking care of children. While I have always been a staunch advocate of proper legislation to safeguard the interests of children who of necessity are compelled to labor in manufacturing plants, yet as a Democrat I am a firm believer in the broad principle of our Government that the States are amply capable of taking care of their own affairs, without the interference of the Federal Government. Many years ago while in the senate of Alabama I introduced the first child-labor bill ever introduced in that State. The State of Alabama has always been watchful of the interests of her people, and we have always felt, and still feel, that we are thoroughly capable of doing so without legislation by Congress. We have a splendid child-labor law and are protecting our children and propose to continue to do so, regardless of what action Congress may take on the measure.

It strikes me that some of these gentlemen on the floor are unduly alarmed about the State not being able to take care of its own affairs. It appears to me that these gentlemen need about as much protection as do the children in the different States.

If the States of the Union are not able to safeguard their children, we must confess that our system of government has been more or less a failure. No one is more deeply interested in the welfare of the children of my State or the welfare of the children of any State of the Union than I am, and no one within the State of Alabama will go further in the matter of legislation to protect their lives and future happiness; but what I want you to do is to recognize the independence of my State and of your sovereign States. Of course in the minds of some of the distinguished gentlemen Alabama can not take care of her children, though they feel that their own particular State can; but by thorough investigation they would learn that Alabama has and is taking care of the laboring element of her citizenship and will continue to do so.

Gentlemen, we should view this matter in an honest, common-sense way, and not in a demagogic fashion, with appeals about the "poor children." That is the trouble with the country to-day. Some Members of the House, when they think that a matter is popular in their district, flock to it without giving the matter any study and without using any reasoning.

Let us allow the State of Alabama and the other States of the Union to take care of their own children and other affairs affecting the internal welfare of their State. We understand local conditions in Alabama better than the man from the far East or the far West, and the man in Pennsylvania understands his home conditions better than we in Alabama could possibly understand them.

I am in favor of all legislation tending to protect the children, but I believe that this is a matter that should be dealt with by the States individually, without Federal interference.

My opposition to this bill is not based on the idea of my not caring for the women and children of the country. My objection to it is that it is another step in an effort to centralize all power at Washington. Centralization of power at Washington will necessarily be harmful to the great masses of our people. Do you think that the people of the different States are willing to admit that they are not capable of local self-government? For myself, I shall never admit nor by my vote indorse the proposition that my people in my State must call on other States to aid them in the regulation of their affairs which are purely domestic. We are a growing State and are from time to time passing laws that deal with all questions that are purely local to our people. Why, then, should we transfer to the Federal Government the right to dictate to Alabama what she should do in the matter of regulating child labor or any other question? All my people in Alabama favor proper legislation with reference to working the children in factories and elsewhere, and I am of the opinion that we are capable of handling this question without the aid of other States. [Applause.]

The American people must sooner or later wake up to a realization of the fact that we have in Congress and elsewhere people who desire the centralization of all power at Washington. Centralization of power here means the destruction of local self-government. The Federal Government conducts its business on the most expensive plan of any government in the world. It has been my effort on more than one occasion to cut down expenses in the different departments of our National Government. This, as the thoughtful citizen knows, is difficult to do.

Mr. Chairman, are not the people of your State better prepared to pass on local questions than are the people from other States? Why, then, should we undertake to pass a law taking away from the different States the right to regulate this great question? The section from which I come is rapidly assuming ascendency in manufactures. Why is it that the Federal Government, through the proponents of this bill, are attempting to take from the State her individual rights which this bill will clearly do.

I will not say that this is done for the purpose of injuring the section from which I come. I can not understand, if this legislation for which a number of the Members of this body are so strenuously contending is meritorious now, why was it not presented and adopted long ago? [Applause.]

Are we, as citizens of Alabama, willing to admit that we are incapable of operating our cotton mills and of manufacturing that great product of the South, wherein we have shown such wonderful skill, without asking the aid and supervision of the Federal Government? I feel that I voice the sentiment of the people of my State and all of the cotton-growing States when I answer no. I am not unmindful of the fact, as the records of this body will show, that when the cotton-growing States, apparently crushed by the war in Europe, sought aid of the National Government to tide over what threatened to be the darkest financial period in their history, most of the gentlemen who now propose to dictate to the South the terms and conditions under which it shall manufacture its cotton and other products were unwilling to have the Federal Government extend a helping hand. Whither are our lawmakers drifting when they are not willing to trust the people of the different States to pass on all questions that vitally affect them?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That in prosecutions under this act each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out the figure "7" and insert the figure "8."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD a telegram which I have just received from a Member of this House, Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ, Representative from the second district of Louisiana. It is as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, February 2, 1916.

Congressman EDWARD KEATING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

If child-labor bill comes to a vote to-morrow, please see that I am paired affirmatively for it. I voted for the measure in the Sixty-third Congress and would again vote for it but for my enforced absence, which I greatly regret.

H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
Representative Second Louisiana District.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect from and after one year from the date of its passage.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out the figure "8" and insert the figure "9."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, with the following instructions: To strike out the word "cannery," in line 7, page 1, and report the same forthwith to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask whether the gentleman is in favor of the bill or not?

Mr. CANNON. I intend to vote for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the word "cannery," on line 7, page 1.

Mr. CANNON. On which I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion is on the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 137.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, I ask for the passage of the bill, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] demands the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 337, nays 46, answered "present" 3, not voting 48, as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN (for) with Mr. LEVER (against).

Mr. BURNETT (for) with Mr. SLAYDEN (against).

Mr. PATTEN (for) with Mr. WILSON of Florida (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. DOOLING with Mr. MOSS of West Virginia.

Mr. DRISCOLL with Mr. PRATT.

Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. ADAIR with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. ALMON with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania with Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. NORTH.

Mr. SMITH of New York with Mr. POWERS.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. ROWLAND.

Mr. REILLY with Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. RODENBERG.

Mr. HEFLIN with Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada.

Mr. HAY with Mr. MORIN.
Mr. GREGG with Mr. MOONEY.
Mr. EAGLE with Mr. MCCULLOCH.
Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. KREIDER.
Mr. CULLOP with Mr. FOCHT.
Mr. BROWN of West Virginia with Mr. GRAY of New Jersey.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to change my vote from "no" to "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. ROGERS, who is not here.

Mr. WISE. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from New York, Mr. CALDWELL, voted?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from New York, and I desire to change my vote from "no" to "present."

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. RODENBERG is ill and unable to be present. He has requested me to state that if he had been present he would have voted for the bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. KEATING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the approval of the Journal to-morrow my colleague, Mr. CARAWAY, and myself be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes each on the suffering, destitution, and distress caused by the great flood on the Arkansas and Mississippi Rivers in the State of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of the business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR] and his colleague [Mr. CARAWAY] shall each be allowed to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of the destruction of life and property by the floods on the Arkansas and Mississippi Rivers in the State of Arkansas. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it likely that there will be a matter before the House the first thing to-morrow which will give the two gentlemen from Arkansas an opportunity to be heard, and when it will be quite appropriate that they should be heard, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects for the reasons stated.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of other business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the Mexican problem and the national defense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] asks unanimous consent that on Saturday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes on the subject of Mexico and the national defense. Of course, this request and all similar requests are subject to privileged matters, appropriation bills, and such things.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—and I shall object—I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] and other gentlemen of the House will have very fair opportunity to address the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union during the consideration of these various appropriation bills; and it has been the invariable custom of the House to refuse permission to gentlemen to address the House on such matters in the House itself when there were appropriation bills coming along.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I withdraw the application, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his application.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS—CORONADO BEACH CO.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KETTNER was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of the Coronado Beach Co. (H. R. 22901, 62d Cong., 2d sess.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LANGLEY, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, February 3, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination for waterway from small-boat harbor, Newport News, Va., to York River, with a view to connecting by canals New Market Creek, Back River, and Poquoson River with York River, in order to provide a safe inland passage for small boats between Newport News and York River (H. Doc. No. 644); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray Thee to keep us this day from sin. Thou art the God of all power. Thou art the God of grace as well. In the great conflict of life, the stage upon which Thou dost enable us to develop our mental and moral power, we pray that we may have regard for the development of our spiritual life as well, that we may not sin against God. Give to us victory over ourselves that our lives may be open in Thy sight and may be approved of Thee. Guide us this day in the discharge of the duties that are upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, January 31, 1916, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF GASOLINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, in response to Senate resolution No. 40, certain information as to the production, consumption, and price of gasoline. It is in response to a resolution submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. The Chair does not know to what committee the communication should be referred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Unless there is some other suggestion made, I suggest that the communication lie on the table temporarily until the Senator from North Dakota arrives.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that it be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds that the communication is accompanied by illustrations, and it will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

ARMY DREDGES "ATLANTIC" AND "RARITAN."

Mr. O'GORMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3606) for the relief of the contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 649) making appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 102) thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 3680) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey for injuries inflicted on their nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 103) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 138) for the relief of the Ottawa Indian Tribe of Blanchard Fork and Rouch de Boeuf, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 104) thereon.

ADJOURNMENT OF DAILY SESSIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report back from the Committee on Rules Senate resolution 88 with a substitute therefor, and recommend that the substitute be passed. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the substitute was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the order of December 6, 1915, as fixes the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. as the time of adjournment be, and the same is hereby, abrogated.

COL. JAMES JACKSON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 1162) to place certain officers of the Army on the retired list, and I submit a report (No. 100) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and place him on the retired list of the Army with the rank and retired pay of brigadier general, any colonel now on the retired list of the Army who served with credit as an enlisted man and officer of the Regular Army of the United States during the Civil War, who has been brevetted captain, major, and lieutenant colonel, respectively, for gallant services in battles in the Civil War and in actions against Indians, who has been awarded the congressional medal of honor for most distinguished gallantry in action against Indians, and who is now and has been since early in 1904 on active duty.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I state in reference to the bill that it applies only to one officer in the United States Army. He is now past 82 years of age, and from the date of his retirement until now he has been doing and is still doing active service in connection wth the Oregon National Guard. He has rendered most efficient service in that respect, as his record discloses he rendered in the Civil War. I have a letter from the War Department reciting the record that this officer has made. In addition to that, Mr. President, I desire to say that he lost an only son about a year ago, a captain in the Army, who was killed in the line of his duty. It has been a great shock to him, and in the very nature of things he can not be with us very long. He is past 82 years old and is still, as I said, engaged in the active service of his country.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator object to giving the name of the officer to whom the bill refers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Col. James Jackson, now detailed with the Oregon National Guard.

Mr. SMOOT. I think when we pass such legislation the name of the particular officer should be given rather than to state that a certain officer should be retired, as is done in the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a letter from the Secretary of War which is made a part of the report, and I will ask that it go into the RECORD to show that Col. Jackson is the only officer to whom the bill can apply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
Washington, January 5, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: I am in receipt of request that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be furnished with any information relative to Senate bill 1162 in possession of the War Department.

It is believed that Col. James Jackson, United States Army, retired, is the only officer who has the qualifications necessary to comply with the requirements of the bill. Col. Jackson's military history is as follows:

He served as an enlisted man in the Twelfth Infantry from November 8, 1861, to April 28, 1863, when appointed second lieutenant in the same regiment. He was promoted to be first lieutenant, August 3, 1863; captain, February 17, 1868; major, January 23, 1889; and lieutenant colonel, June 19, 1897. He was retired from active service as lieutenant colonel November 21, 1897, by operation of law, having reached the age of 64 years. He was advanced to the rank of colonel on the retired list under the act of April 23, 1904, by reason of Civil War service. He was breveted captain August 1, 1864, and major August 18, 1964, for gallant services in the battles of North Anna River and Weldon Railroad, Virginia, respectively, and lieutenant colonel February 27, 1890, for gallant and meritorious services in actions against Indians. He was awarded a medal of honor on April 17, 1896, for most distinguished gallantry in action against hostile Nez Perce Indians at Camas Meadows, Idaho, August 20, 1877.

He was detailed for duty with the Oregon Militia in May, 1904, as a retired officer, and has since then remained on this duty.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. BRYAN. May I ask the Senator from Oregon to substitute for the bill reported a bill to authorize the President to place this officer on the retired list and to give him this rank? In that form I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill at this time nor to the bill whenever it shall come up, but I do object to the present consideration of a bill using a lot of general language when designed only for the benefit of one officer.

I do this for the reason that it will set a bad precedent. There may be some officers entitled to this unusual distinction; but every officer, whether he comes within the terms of the act or not, will apply for general legislation that would be beneficial to him in a manner similar to this, if not the same that is covered by the general language of the bill as reported by the committee.

I shall therefore object to the consideration of the bill unless the Senator will submit a substitute for the bill as reported providing that this officer shall be given the benefit of this legislation. If that is done, I shall not object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will notice the bill, it really does limit the promotion, because it mentions particularly the service of this officer. The letter from the Secretary of War, which is a part of this report, will show that to be the case.

Mr. BRYAN. The evil of this kind of legislation was illustrated by a provision in the naval appropriation act last year. There was language covering two or three pages so drawn as to care for one particular individual. It could not apply to anyone else. I can not see the sense in using a lot of words to accomplish a purpose in a bill that appears to be general, instead of saying directly and specifically and positively and definitely exactly what we mean to do.

In addition to that, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], if we desire to give special honor to this officer, it comes with better grace to name him and say he is the man we mean rather than to have general legislation, which will be used as a precedent because obviously, according to its language, it is meant to apply generally.

If I had the name of the officer and knew the exact language to use in order to carry out the purpose, I would move a substitute, giving his name and making him a brigadier general on the retired list.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I withdraw the request and ask that the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—COUNTING A QUORUM.

Mr. NELSON. For the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I report favorably with an amendment, from the Committee on Rules, Senate resolution No. 7, providing that any Senator upon his own request may be recorded and counted as present in order to constitute a quorum.

Mr. O'GORMAN subsequently said: A moment since the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] reported a resolution from the Committee on Rules. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS December 7, 1915, and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended as follows: In Rule XII, clause 1, after the words "by the Senate," there shall be inserted the following: "and any Senator may arise and declare that he is paired and how he would vote if not paired, and may add that being present he desires to be so recorded, in order to constitute a quorum; whereupon he shall be so recorded and his presence as a part of the quorum announced by the Chair."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar.

REPORTS OF ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred House concurrent resolution No. 11, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the reports of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, in two volumes, for the period from March 12, 1914, to December 31, 1915, inclusive, together with accompanying maps, charts, and profiles, be printed as a House document, and that 6,000 additional copies be printed, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,500 copies for the use of the commission.

SPECIAL REPORT ON DISEASES OF THE HORSE.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred House concurrent resolution No. 13, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 100,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse, the same to be first revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture; 70,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 30,000 for the use of the Senate.

SPECIAL REPORT ON DISEASES OF CATTLE.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred House concurrent resolution No. 14, reported it favorably without amendment and it was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 100,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle, the same to be first revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, 70,000 copies for use of the House of Representatives and 30,000 copies for use of the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I notice that reports were made from the Committee on Printing just a moment ago authorizing the printing of 100,000 copies of various worthy publications, and I want to address a question to the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. FLETCHER]. On the 7th of December I introduced a resolution proposing to print 100,000 copies of the final report of the Commission on Industrial Relations. I receive every day requests for copies of that report. I have only one copy. I am certain that every other Senator has received requests for copies, and I should like to ask the Senator from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, what progress is being made in reference thereto?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state, Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's inquiry, that the resolution submitted by the Senator called for the printing of the report to which he has referred. A resolution has passed the House, has come to the Senate, and has been referred to the Committee on Printing, calling for the printing of this report. Other resolutions have been submitted calling for the printing of the testimony. We have been considering all these resolutions, but upon investigation we find that the report as submitted by the commission is in the shape of three dry-goods boxes full of material. It has been very difficult to separate the real testimony from certain exhibits, which are regarded perhaps by the commission itself as not a part of the testimony. The committee has been laboring somewhat under the disadvantage of not knowing precisely what was desired to have printed, either by the commission or by the various Members who have submitted resolutions here and in the other body. We shall, however, hold a meeting of the committee on Saturday night. We shall probably then determine the matter and be able to report either in favor of printing the report itself or of printing the report with the testimony, or of printing the report with the testimony confined to certain matter which would not include the exhibits, in the nature of books and publications which have already been printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to say to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that I have received a great many requests for the report, but have received no request for the testimony. The requests which have come to me have indicated that what is desired is a large number of copies of the report. That would be much less expensive than to undertake to print the testimony; and as that seems to be what is desired, I urge the printing of a large number of copies of the report itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is no disposition at all, I may say, on the part of any member of the committee not to have the report printed; there is, on the contrary, a desire to have printed all that may be wanted, including the testimony, or such portions of it as would not include books already published.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Florida that I have had requests similar to those received by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I do not think anybody wants the testimony, but there is almost a universal demand throughout the United States, if I may take the requests that I have received from Mississippi as an index, for this report. I should like very much if the committee would have the report printed in sufficient numbers to meet the demand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think beyond any doubt the resolution covering the printing of the report will be favorably acted on; but there are other resolutions calling for the printing of the testimony, which, of course, the committee has been obliged to consider.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Florida yield for a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Can the Senator state approximately the amount of matter that would be comprised in the publication if it embraced the entire testimony, together with the exhibits?

Mr. FLETCHER. If it embraced the entire testimony with the exhibits there would be 12 or 14 volumes, and perhaps more.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the committee making the investigation for the purpose of determining whether or not it is necessary or advisable to print all of that testimony?

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee has been looking into that question with the assistance of the secretary of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. I myself have received a great many requests for copies of this report. I do not know whether the requests contemplated copies of the testimony taken by the commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. The commission itself has asked for the printing of a portion of the testimony, but omitting certain exhibits. The committee does not desire to be put in the position of editing the commission's report or excluding any portion of it. At the same time, certain of the exhibits are published books, whole volumes, and it seems to us they can be referred to as, say, "See Exhibit No. so and so," or "See book of such and such a title, published at such and such time," and so forth, without reprinting the book.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the commission insist upon the reprinting of those books which have been incorporated as exhibits?

Mr. FLETCHER. Apparently that is one difficulty we are having, as to whether the matter reported is an exhibit which has to be reprinted or can be simply referred to. In that case the whole thing would have to be edited.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has an estimate been made as to the cost of printing?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; we have had estimates made. I have not the figures with me right now, but I will say that to print the entire report, including the testimony and all these exhibits, would run into a tremendous sum, exceeding $100,000, I think.

Mr. ROBINSON. What would it cost to print the report proper without the testimony?

Mr. FLETCHER. To print the report itself, without the testimony, would cost $7,847.75, embracing 320 pages and furnishing 100,000 copies.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee has not yet reached the conclusion, then, as to whether or not the whole matter is to be published and printed?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not precisely. We shall determine that at our next meeting, and I think will be able to report by Monday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator from Florida say that the Committee on Printing was considering the advisability of printing a part of the testimony?

Mr. FLETCHER. That involves a question of determining what is the testimony. For instance, the testimony may be held, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, as including exhibits.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Assuming that the testimony means what the witnesses said before the Industrial Commission, irrespective of the exhibits to which they referred, is the Committee on Printing proposing to print the testimony that was taken before the Industrial Commission?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is one thing the committee is considering; yes. The committee desires to print the testimony without any elimination. The only point is as to printing the testimony instead of printing the exhibits. There are certain volumes, certain published books, which are called exhibits, which the committee feels need not be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that. Of course, if I may express an opinion, I should say that it would be absurd to print the exhibits to which witnesses may have referred, and which consist of books, documents, and so forth, that are already in print. I wanted to know whether the committee was really considering the printing of the testimony of the witnesses before the Industrial Commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee is considering that, and one of the resolutions involves that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the committee has not yet been able to decide what constitutes the testimony, as I understand the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Therefore, of course, no estimate has been made as to what would be the cost of printing the testimony?

Mr. FLETCHER. We have estimates as to that also, but the estimates are based upon the printing of the exhibits as well as the testimony; so that the matter is in a rather indefinite shape on that account at present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Could the Senator, without violating any confidence or committee secrets, advise the Senate what the estimate was as to the printing of the testimony and of the exhibits?

Mr. SMOOT. Two hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. FLETCHER. One estimate we had, taking in all the data that was submitted, called for an expenditure of about $220,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Only $220,000?

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe that was the figure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is that the lowest estimate?

Mr. FLETCHER. That would include the exhibits as well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is one estimate?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was there any lower estimate than that?

Mr. FLETCHER. If we eliminate the exhibits that are already in print, as the Senator has suggested, that amount will be very materially reduced, of course.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee, perhaps, has not stated as explicitly as he might have done that the members of the late Industrial Relations Commission, or whatever the title of the commission was, have not asked the committee to print the exhibits. On the contrary, they have suggested to the committee that, in their judgment, it was not necessary to print them. There are two or three great dry goods boxes full of books which have been put in as exhibits, and, as the Senator from Connecticut has said, it would look rather absurd to undertake to print those books at the expense of the Government, they being already in print. As I understood, the contention of the members of the commission who appeared before the Printing Committee was that they wanted the final report printed and the actual testimony, the words spoken by the witnesses, but that they would not insist upon the printing of the exhibits. I will ask the Senator if that was not their position?

Mr. FLETCHER. That was their position, I think. As I understand, the Senator states that quite correctly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is all out of order, Mr. President, but I will not make the point.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I ask has there been any estimate made as to the cost of printing the testimony and the report after the elimination of the matter to which he has referred?

Mr. FLETCHER. That estimate is being looked into now. We will have that estimate by Saturday night. I do not think it has been definitely reported upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida how many copies are to be printed under the estimate just stated by the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. The estimate as to the cost of printing the report is based upon a hundred thousand copies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Including the testimony?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the report itself. We have not yet obtained a definite estimate as to the cost of printing the testimony, and the number of copies of that we have not yet determined upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that the printing of the report would be of any great value unless the testimony were printed, so that opportunity might be given to weigh the soundness of the report?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would say that, personally, so far as I am concerned, I would be in favor of printing the testimony and referring in the print to the exhibits without reprinting the exhibits; but the general view seems to be that perhaps the report is all that would likely be read extensively, and that it would probably serve all the purposes of everyone in connection with that work. That is evidenced by the fact that the other body, the House of Representatives, has passed a resolution to print the report, but has said nothing about the testimony. So that I can answer the Senator upon that point by saying that it is quite clearly in the mind of a number of people and of the other body that the printing of the report is all that is required.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that, if the investigation was warranted at all, those interested in the matter would a great deal rather see the testimony than the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the disposition of the committee is to print the testimony, eliminating what might be called a part of it, namely, the exhibits that are already in print.

ANSHE CHESED CONGREGATION, VICKSBURG, MISS.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 4954) directing the Secretary of War to reconvey a parcel of land to the Anshe Chesed Congregation, Vicksburg, Miss., and I submit a report (No. 105) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It will take but a moment to consider it. The Anshe Chesed Congregation of Vicksburg deeded to the Vicksburg National Park 19 acres of land in 1900. It was thought at that time that it would not be needed for cemetery purposes, but since then the Jewish cemetery there has about filled up, and they are asking that the Secretary of War be permitted to deed back to the congregation an acre and a half of this land. The bill has been approved by the Secretary of War and by the president of the Vicksburg National Park Commission. The bill really ought to be passed, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas when the Public Lands Committee passed upon this bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN. It was reported just a moment ago.

Mr. THOMPSON. My recollection is that the committee passed on the bill either yesterday or the day before.

Mr. SMOOT. The Committee on Public Lands have authorized the report of the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. It must have been at a time when I stepped out of the committee room.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not remember whether the Senator from Utah was present or not. It is a unanimous report, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to convey by deed to the Anshe Chesed Congregation, Vicksburg, Miss., a small tract of land for cemetery purposes, which land is now part of the Vicksburg National Military Park, and more particularly described by metes and bounds as follows:

Commencing at the southeast corner of a tract of land as described in deed book C C, page 611, in chancery clerk's office, Warren County, Miss.; thence with an astronomical azimuth 100° and 40′ 992 feet to a stone post; then 209° and 10′ 509 feet to a stone post; thence 225° and 55′ 461 feet to a stone post; thence 220° and 50′ 398 feet to a stone post on the south side of the Baldwins Ferry road; thence 296° and 10′ 198 feet; thence 355° and 10′ 105 feet; thence 23° and 15′ 178 feet to the point of beginning.

Thence with an astronomical azimuth 0° and 15′ 534 feet; thence 270° and 15′ 318½ feet; thence 132° and 5′ 251 feet; thence 171° and 20′ 259 feet; thence 134° and 25′ 143 feet to the point of beginning; containing 1.64 acres, more or less, and being part of section 21, township 16, range 4 east: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in carrying out the provisions of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 96) relating to the removal of the Botanic Garden; to the Committee on the Library.

MILITARY TRAINING.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I introduce a bill to encourage military training. The bill is quite an important measure, which I desire to go to the committee at once, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 4229) to encourage military training was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1917, no person then under the age of 40 years shall be eligible to appointment in the classified service unless prior to such time such person shall have voluntarily received, under rules and regulations made and published under authority of the Secretary of War, such military training for a period of at least two months as shall be provided for in such rules and regulations. No person shall, after such regulations shall have been published 60 days, be eligible to appointment to the classified service who shall not have become enrolled under said regulations as prepared to take the training thereby prescribed and have agreed to take such training regularly, and, so far as time has permitted, have fulfilled such agreement and complied with such regulations.

SEC. 2. That no one shall hereafter, after such rules and regulations have been published, be examined for appointment in the classified service who shall not have become enrolled as aforesaid, have agreed to take the training provided under such rules and regulations, and have fulfilled such agreement so far as the intervening time between enrollment under such regulations and date of any examination has permitted; and from and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1919, no person under the age of 43 years shall be permitted to take an examination for appointment to the classified service or to remain in said service unless such person shall under said regulations have received the training thereby prescribed for military service or its equivalent.

SEC. 3. That no one shall be permitted or qualified to appear as attorney or solicitor in any court of the United States unless for at least one month in each year for and during four years hereafter, or until he shall reach the age of 45 years, he shall have received the military training provided for by such regulations.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to prepare and publish regulations enabling persons, under the provisions thereof, to become enrolled for and receive the training prescribed under such regulations; for issuing to such persons certificates that such duty has been duly performed; for excusing persons physically or mentally unfit for such training from taking the same; for substituting in case of women, training for hospital or similar service in lieu of such military training; and providing that those members of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, conscientiously opposed to performing military service which may involve the taking of human life, may in lieu of military training, under such regulations, take such training useful to the Nation in time of war as shall be, by said regulations, prescribed as the useful equivalent thereof.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $650,000 for the purchase of all land on Cushing Island, Portland Harbor, Me., not at present owned in part by the Government, intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 for the improvement of Madison Street from Fourteenth Street to Colorado Avenue NW., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. COLT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 91), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress, to hold hearings on S. 4086, a bill to provide for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy and to prevent the spread of leprosy in the United States; to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to pay the expenses of witnesses under limitations provided by law, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 89), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library, or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 90), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move the reference of Senate joint resolution 91, now on the table, creating a joint subcommittee of the Military and Naval Committees of the Senate and House to investigate national defense, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is not very often that I ask to have anything inserted in the RECORD, but I hold in my hand a statement from the Washington Post of January 30. It is not an editorial. It is a compilation of the figures, according to the best estimates, of the indebtedness incurred and loss in life and disability in the European war. I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTY-SEVEN BILLION SIXTY-ONE MILLION DOLLARS IS SPENT IN 18 MONTHS OF WAR; NO DECISIVE BLOW YET—LOSSES IN KILLED, WOUNDED AND PRISONERS SINCE STRUGGLE BEGAN ARE MORE THAN 15,000,000—BANKRUPTCY MENACES GREAT NATIONS ENGAGED IN TERRIBLE STRUGGLE, IN WHICH NEITHER SIDE HAS BEEN ABLE TO GAIN AN ADVANTAGE—TWO BATTLE LINES, 1,950 MILES LONG, ARE DEADLOCKED AT EVERY POINT, WITH BELLIGERENT COUNTRIES BLEEDING TO DEATH—ALLIES AND GERMANS, CONFIDENT OF RESULT, REFUSE TO CONSIDER PEACE.

The European war will have lasted 18 months to-morrow—the blackest 18 months known to the modern world.

What has been accomplished?

No European country has been benefited, nor has human liberty advanced at any point, nor has any great moral principle triumphed in any place or on any battlefield.

The net result has been 2,990,000 men in the very prime of life killed, more than 2,200,000 made prisoners, and more than 9,830,000 wounded and maimed, many crippled for life.

BLOODSHED THE HEAVIEST TOLL.

This measureless bloodshed and suffering, making millions widows and many more millions orphans, has been the heaviest toll of the war.

Next the money loss—$10,862,000,000 borrowed for war by Germany, Austria, and Hungary; $16,199,000,000 borrowed for war by France, England, Russia, and Italy; a grand total of $27,061,000,000 spent in making war.

WASTE OF MONEY STUPENDOUS.

The mind can not grasp such stupendous figures or such wastage. It means twenty-seven times the total national debt of the United States, incurred in 139 years of history, including five wars.

It means a sum equal to the entire savings or increase in capital of the entire world for 10 years.

It means a debt of about $360 for every family in all belligerent countries—more than the total income of a year of every European peasant family or unskilled laborer in Europe.

It means tax burdens for this generation and for generations yet unborn that will make the burdens of life greater than ever before for all.

ECONOMIC CRASH AT HAND.

In short, as Mr. Diamant, the expert in foreign exchange, wrote last week, bankruptcy is so menacing in all the warring countries that "if political economy does not soon make an end of the war the war will make an end of political economy."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here an address delivered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] before the Kansas Society of New York City, at the Kansas birthday banquet given on Saturday evening, January 29, 1916. It is a very able address, and I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I could not hear a word the Senator from Texas said, and I should like to have him repeat the request.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submitted a copy of an address delivered by the Senator from Kansas last Saturday night before the Kansas Society, of New York City.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator ask that it be printed in the RECORD or printed as a public document?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that it be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR WILLIAM H. THOMPSON BEFORE THE KANSAS SOCIETY, OF NEW YORK CITY, AT THE KANSAS BIRTHDAY BANQUET GIVEN AT THE WALDORF-ASTORIA, SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 29, 1916.

"THE ECONOMIC VALUE OF PROHIBITION."

It is a great pleasure to see so many old Kansans here. It is a high honor to address the Kansas Society of New York City. January 29 is an important date to all Kansans. It marks an important time in my life, because on this day three years ago I was elected to the United States Senate by the Kansas Legislature. It is the birthday of Kansas. Our State is 55 years old—only an infant as time is computed in the life of a State or Nation. Fifty-five years ago to-day the "ship of State" was launched, and Kansas's star first appeared in the far West, announcing to the world the birth of a new State to add new life and power to the greatest Republic on earth. With all her thrilling and glorious history, all her failures and successes, that star still shines and has become the brightest in the constellation of States. The late Eugene F. Ware, Kansas's greatest poet, and who was one of her best and ablest men, in his Rhymes of Ironquill, said:

Of all the States, but three will live in story:
Old Massachusetts with her Plymouth Rock,
And old Virginia with her noble stock,
And sunny Kansas with her woes and glory.

The love of an American citizen for his native State is second only to his love for his country. A great deal has been said during these turbulent times about the lack of patriotism in America, with which I do not agree. I still believe that the American people, individually or collectively, are the most patriotic people in the world. If it should ever come to a test it would soon be so demonstrated beyond all question of doubt in the minds of the most skeptical. While I know you have great love for your adopted State—New York—yet I am sure you still appreciate the feeling of the fellow who attended a revival meeting in Kansas, and who, when the evangelist got to that part of his sermon where he asked all who desired to go to heaven to stand up, was the only man to remain seated. The evangelist inquired, "What is the matter with you; why don't you want to go to heaven?" He replied, "Kansas is good enough for me."

The subject to which I have been assigned, "The economic value of prohibition," reduced to common everyday English—the language Kansans delight to speak—presents the simple question, Does prohibition in Kansas pay? Unfortunately, the value of most everything nowadays is measured by dollars and cents. If it pays, it is usually pronounced a good thing. If it is a money loser, it is usually pronounced a bad thing. Measured by this standard prohibition is the best thing we have in Kansas. If I were asked what one law results in greatest financial returns and benefits to the people of Kansas, I would answer "the prohibitory liquor law."

The prohibitory amendment was adopted by the people in the general election of 1880. We have, therefore, had over 35 years of prohibition in Kansas. It is true we have not had complete prohibition in actual practice during all that time, for, much to our shame and chagrin, there were many years in which the law was not strenuously enforced. The saloons were closed, but there was no determined effort to do away with "blind tigers" and other liquor joints, particularly in the larger cities, until the crusade of Carrie Nation along about the year 1900. With the forcible use of her little hatchet upon bottles, mirrors, and bars, and frequently upon the head of a joint keeper, she soon made the life of the "jointist" miserable. She proclaimed the doctrine that it was not unlawful to strike down an unlawful business, even if you had to resort to unlawful means. Whatever criticism may be made of her unlawful method of destroying an unlawful business, yet her strenuous work resulted in great good by calling direct attention of the people to the open and defiant violation of the law, which they had theretofore thought impossible to remedy. The issue was at once raised as to whether these violators of the constitution and the laws of the State were greater than the State itself. This so enraged the people that they demanded action on the part of public officials who had been in the habit, more or less, of winking at the unlawful business, and soon thereafter the liquor laws were enforced everywhere. For the last 10 or 12 years, even in the larger cities, there has not been a saloon, joint, blind tiger, speak-easy, drug store, or any other place generally known to the public where intoxicating liquors have been sold. We have, therefore, for the last decade had complete prohibition everywhere in the State. As we review the past it will be observed that the more strenuously we enforced the law the greater has been our prosperity.

January 1, 1916, we paid off the last dollar of indebtedness against the State. Only five other States in the Union have been financially able to do this. In 1880 when the prohibitory amendment was adopted the bonded indebtedness of the State amounted to $1,881,975. In 1903 it was still $632,000. About this time we commenced the vigorous and determined enforcement of the prohibitory law. We made the first payment of $18,000 on this principal in December, 1908, and the last payment of $159,000 on January 1, 1916. Thus in about seven years of complete prohibition we paid this entire debt.

But the payment of the State's indebtedness does not mark the greatest economic value of prohibition. We have gradually increased in material wealth upon every hand until we have become the wealthiest State in the Union per capita. We have increased in wealth in the past 10 years, during complete prohibition, at the rate of $120,000,000 per year. Our per capita wealth is $1,630, being twice that of the Nation. We have nearly $3,000,000,000 of taxable wealth, requiring only the low-tax levy of $1.25 per thousand—lower than the tax rate of any other State in the Union, except one. The State owns various public institutions valued at $21,500,000. It has a permanent school fund of $10,485,299. It has invested in its school property more than $28,000,000.

We spent last year $12,210,000 for educational purposes. We have enrolled in our colleges 27,000 students—the largest college attendance in proportion to population of any State of the Union. We point with pride to the fact that we have less than 2 per cent of illiteracy—next to the lowest of any State in the Union. Since 1880, during the 35 years of prohibition, the illiteracy of our people has been reduced from 49 per cent to less than 2 per cent.

Kansas municipal bonds are as salable as any other municipal bonds anywhere in the Union and at as low a rate of interest, and at least one-half of these bonds are now owned by Kansas people and $10,000,000 of such bonds are held by the State school funds. So if any of our friends here on Wall Street own Kansas municipal bonds and want to sell them they can easily do so at a premium at any time. They at least need not hesitate to purchase them at a reasonable rate, for they can find no better investment anywhere. The brewery interests of the country spend much time and money in endeavoring to demonstrate by the juggling of figures that Kansas is fast on the road to bankruptcy. But regardless of what they contend, when it comes to investing their own money you will find they have purchased and hold all the Kansas securities they are able to secure. They understand better than anyone else that people who do not spend their money for liquors have plenty of money to pay their debts when they become due, and that they can depend upon any obligations they make being paid.

This is not the only way in which the wealth of the State is shown, much of which results from prohibition. We have about 1,700,000 people. These people have cash on deposit in the State and National banks to the amount of about $225,000,000, being $132 in cash on hand for every man, woman, and child in the State—a greater amount per capita than can be shown by any other State in the Union.

In addition to this, we have helped build up one of the largest and most prosperous cities in the United States on our border at the mouth of the Kaw. While about one-third of this great city—Kansas City—is on the Kansas side of the line and we receive the advantage of its wealth and deposits, yet Kansas has furnished, and is now furnishing, fully 50 per cent of the banking and other business of Kansas City, Mo. Most every bank in Kansas carries a balance in Kansas City, Mo., and these deposits are added to the deposits of Missouri. If we received the benefit of the actual money belonging to the Kansas banks and Kansas people in Missouri, we could point to $500,000,000 deposits for the Sunflower State.

We have about 75,000 automobiles in the State, being 1 car to every fifth family, enough to take every man, woman, and child living in our State an auto ride of 25 miles every day in the year. We have 340,000 telephones—sufficient to supply a telephone for every family of five—the largest percentage of any State.

We have a lower death rate than any other State in the Nation. Of course, people who have more fun at a funeral than anywhere else may not think this a blessing. It is in the Two Orphans, where the boys were forbidden to go to the funeral of a neighbor whom their parents did not like, when one of them remonstrated: "Pa never did want us boys to have any fun." While some people may not think the low death rate an advantage, yet if you do not have too many enemies, it is a point worth considering.

There are no idle men in Kansas. Anybody who really wants work can always find it. There are very few farmers or merchants who really have enough help, and they are unable to get it. There is only one pauper to every 3,000 population, and there are 38 county poor farms which have no inmates, and many counties which have no poor farms at all and have no need for them. We have a half million boys and girls in the State who have never seen a saloon. I have a boy 16 and a girl 18 who had never seen a saloon until we went to Washington. What a sad commentary upon the Capital of our Nation. But this will not exist for long. The Capital of the Nation is soon to be dry, and decisive steps in that direction will be taken by the present Congress.

In addition to all this existing wealth, Kansas coins more wealth every year at the rate of about $650,000,000 from farm products and live stock. In 1915 these items aggregated $652,217,081, and our manufacturing products amounted to $325,000,000. This great production would enable our State alone to pay the entire appropriation for the Army, Navy, and coast defenses necessary for the protection of our country from war and still have plenty of money left for our people. It would, therefore, seem that if one State in the Union alone is able to pay for all the necessary preparation for defense, which we hear so much about every day, the preparedness program of President Wilson can not be regarded as unreasonable when we have the whole Nation to draw upon. If by the appropriation of an additional $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 per year for a short time now we can safely protect the honor and integrity of the Nation and insure our country against war, it will certainly be better than running the risk of war and of spending billions later on. If war should come, this country would not hesitate, and, in my judgment, would be required, to expend $100,000,000 every day the war continued. There is a great difference between preparation for defense to preserve peace and preparation for war. No sane American citizen wants war. Whatever this administration does toward preparedness will be in the interest of preserving peace.

We have in Kansas a sober, industrious, law-abiding, and patriotic people. With such a people, and health, wealth, and prosperity upon every hand, nothing but happiness can result. Kansas does not take second place to any of her sister States in happiness, prosperity, and intelligent citizenship. Kansas prosperity is not mythical; it is real. Kansas property is tangible. It is not made up simply of an aggregation or multiplication of figures and statistics, but you can put your fingers on it. The boys and girls who grow up in the Sunflower State under such moral, healthful, and physical surroundings rapidly forge to the front and outstrip their less fortunate brothers in the rough and tumble struggle of life. Pure minds, strong bodies, stout hearts, and a determination and grit that can not be subdued, tell the story. Our sons are at the top in every great city, from Chicago, in the North, to New Orleans, in the South; from San Francisco, in the West, to New York City, in the East. I congratulate you upon your preferment here.

While prohibition is not the sole cause of all these great blessings, yet it is fair to say that it has contributed largely and, I think, more than any other one factor, to bringing it about. There is one thing sure, and that is that 90 per cent of the people of Kansas are satisfied with it. At the last general election the resubmission proposition received less than 10 per cent of the votes of the people. It is a reform in Kansas that is here to stay, and is a reform gradually growing everywhere, until within another decade it will sweep the entire country, this great city of New York included.

With the millions of dollars unnecessarily expended for intoxicating liquor every year over the country devoted to useful purposes, the time will come when there will not be want anywhere, and the people now homeless and in starving and suffering condition will own their own homes and there will be plenty for everybody. Sixty-four and eight-tenths per cent of the homes owned by the people of Kansas are free from incumbrance, while in license States like New Jersey only 43.3 per cent of the homes are owned free. In a country like this, with the greatest wealth and resources of any nation in the world, there is something wrong when there is a single man, woman, or child anywhere in the land suffering for any necessity. Eradicate the liquor traffic, and you have struck down the worst evil in the country, and have taken a step that will tend more than anything else to bring about comfort, prosperity, patriotism, and happiness everywhere.

MOUNT KEARSARGE AND MOUNT PEQUAWKET, N. H. (S. DOC. NO. 307).

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a document the statement compiled by David M. Hildreth, topographer, Post Office Department, and member of the United States Geographic Board, being historical notes relating to the conflicting names of two mountains in the State of New Hampshire. It is a matter of consequence to the people of my State, and as the statement is brief, I ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that 1,000 additional copies of the statement be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

"BACK TO THE CONSTITUTION" (S. DOC. NO. 308).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have an article which is a reprint from volume 3 of the Virginia Law Review, entitled "Back to the Constitution," written by Judge Walter Clark, chief justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUGAR STATISTICS (S. DOC. NO. 309).

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to have printed as a public document a pamphlet of five and a half pages, being statistics relating to the Hawaiian sugar industry, compiled by the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IMPROVEMENT OF ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if there is no other order of business, I desire to make a motion. I have been instructed by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to move that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from the consideration of House bill 7617, to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

I understand that this is rather a delicate matter; but the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have always, so far as I know, had charge of this subject—the building, construction, and maintenance of post roads. The committee have reported one or two bills on this subject, and they feel that they ought to have charge of and the consideration of this bill. It is a very important one. It is a matter that has been recommended in our national platforms by both parties for four and eight years. It seems to me that the time has come when there ought to be some action on the subject, and that that action ought to come from the committee naturally having charge of the subject.

The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. GORE] is absent, and I understand will be away for three weeks or more. The second member of that committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], also a member of the Post Office Committee, believes that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ought to have jurisdicition of this subject, and that they ought to be permitted, as has heretofore been the case, to consider and report a bill.

I have nothing further to say, except that I think——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. During the last Congress a House bill on this same subject was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; was it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I believe we ought not to dispose of the matter finally to-day. I am not sure that he would object, but I think there ought to be an opportunity to communicate with him. The rule provides that the matter may go over on the request of a single Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before objection is made, I should like to say a few words.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that unless the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee, has changed his mind since yesterday afternoon, he will object to it, and seriously object.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I thought it was best to allow his clerks an opportunity to communicate with him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection, is there?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; not at present. I think the Senator from Georgia desires to be heard.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two in reply to the views expressed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

We have in the Agricultural Department a Good Roads Bureau. We have in the Agricultural Department an organization devoted to the study of good roads, engaged in going out and giving aid in the construction of good roads. Any appropriations that have heretofore been made by Congress looking toward the improvement of roads have been administered under the Agricultural Department.

It is true that some of these bills have been referred heretofore to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and some of them have been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which this bill has been heretofore referred, has had the bill under consideration. The committee has gone over it. It has taken up certain other bills that have been introduced upon this subject, and has been studying amendments to the House bill with a view of perfecting it. The House bill has for its title "to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways." It provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, on the part of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction and maintenance of the roads which may be used in the transportation, and so forth.

Mr. BRYAN. The transportation of what?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It says, "the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, and postal matters," but the Secretary of Agriculture is to administer the bill. The whole purpose of the bill is, under the Department of Agriculture, to do certain work.

So far as I am personally concerned, I do not care which committee has the bill, except that I feel that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is very favorable to some such legislation. I believe we will have a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I know that at the last Congress we had an unfavorable report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I wish the Senate understood the situation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. On the contrary, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported a bill at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; it reported a bill which we knew could not pass. It reported the Bourne bill, which involved an expenditure of $500,000,000—was it not—in the nature of a bond issue.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Did not that look liberal enough?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but the bill made no progress here at all. It died as a result of the report.

I only wish the Senate to understand the status of the matter, so that when the vote is had we may vote intelligently upon the subject. If I felt confident that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads would report this House bill with proper amendments favorably, and give us an opportunity to pass it, it would be just as satisfactory to me for it to be there as with the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Of course I may be mistaken. I hope, if it goes to the Post Office Committee, that a favorable report will be presented.

Mr. TOWNSEND rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has had the bill before it, and has been at work upon it, and the members agreed to take certain other bills and study them and bring in suggestions of amendments, and we were to hold another meeting in the near future to act on the bill. If we leave the bill before the Committee on Agriculture we may expect a speedy report favorable to the House bill with, perhaps, some amendments. I had intended to do what the Senator from Arkansas intended to do, make the point as to the time of consideration; but I will not make it until the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] makes any remarks that he wishes to make.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has disclosed the purpose which was in the view of some members of the committee in having this bill referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry instead of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. If that is a proper reference, if the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is not to have anything to do with the subject of post roads, we had better amend the title of the committee.

The Senator from Georgia says that he wants this bill to come to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry because the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is not in favor of the sort of bill he wants to have enacted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not go that far. I said I feared it was not. I said I preferred to have it stay before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry because I was confident it was favorable. I would not undertake to say what the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads would do. I hope, if the bill remains there, that we will have a favorable report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, this bill, as indicated by its title, after it gets through the compliment to the Secretary of Agriculture, states that the purpose of it is to establish roads for the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, and postal matter. In 1912, in the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, the Senate was called upon to consider an item which came from the House in the House bill to establish post roads. The Senate at that time was not able to agree to the plan outlined in the House bill, and instead of passing any legislation at all upon the subject this provision was inserted in the House bill and agreed to in conference:

> That a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of five Members of the Senate, to be designated by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and five Members of the House, to be designated by the chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to make inquiry into the subject of Federal aid in the construction of post roads and report—

And so forth.

In pursuance of that legislation a joint committee was created. At that time the then Senator from Oregon, Mr. Bourne, was chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. He designated the four other Members of the Senate. Likewise five Members were designated from the House. That commission of the two Houses of Congress began to investigate this subject in order to start right in lending the aid of the Federal Government to the States in the building and maintenance of good roads.

The term of office of the Senator from Oregon expired, but because of his interest in the subject he remained at Washington through the Sixty-third Congress. Being chairman of that joint commission, he devoted much time and study to this subject; and as the result of that investigation a report was made to Congress that is conceded to be the ablest discussion of the whole subject of good roads that has ever been had.

At the last session of Congress a bill came over from the House of Representatives. It never occurred to a single individual in the Senate to move or suggest that that bill dealing with post roads should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It went, as naturally it should have gone, to the committee established for the purpose of considering post roads. Why, Mr. President, under the Constitution, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was the only committee that would naturally have a right to this bill. The Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was not in sympathy with the kind of legislation the House of Representatives wanted, and instead of reporting favorably the House bill the Senate committee substituted, with a few minor changes, the bill recommended by the joint commission appointed by Congress to investigate this subject.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, he is entirely mistaken. The joint committee never recommended the Bourne bill. In fact, it made no recommendation for any bill. As an individual report of Mr. Bourne——

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see whether it did or not, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. I signed the report; the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] signed the report.

Mr. BRYAN. Senator Bourne says they did, and here is what the Senator from Virginia had to say at that time.

Mr. SWANSON. The report has been published.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I will read it. (Reading:)

DECEMBER 31, 1914.

Hon. JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
Chairman Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads, United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We have read the report submitted to us by you, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads, for our consideration, and we take this opportunity of expressing our approval of the report, with the exception of some parts of chapter 2.

Now, Mr. President, chapter 2 does not deal with the subject, except that in that chapter Senator Bourne proceeded to criticize the activity of some of the executive departments. That is all chapter 2 dealt with. Then this letter proceeds:

The great work you have accomplished in such short time is remarkable, and we think the committee owes you a vote of thanks for your unselfish and untiring devotion in preparing this work for the committee. It will undoubtedly be a great textbook on the subject of good roads.

We, as members of the committee, thank you and appreciate the splendid services you have rendered the committee as its chairman.

Very truly, yours,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON.
LEE S. OVERMAN.

In the body of this it says:

We take this opportunity of expressing our approval of the report, with the exception of some parts of chapter 2.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Just a minute. That criticizes what Senator Bourne considered was a grasping after power by the heads of executive departments.

I do not know whether the Senator meant by that language to say he approved of the report otherwise than that, but it leads me to that conclusion.

Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has devoted four years to a study of this subject. It is a subject that deals with post roads. It was a sharp trick to have a bill referred to a committee that was thought to be favorable to the House bill.

I will say in passing that whichever committee keeps jurisdiction of this bill, whenever it is considered in the Senate the Senate will have an opportunity and will be given the opportunity to compare the merits of the Bourne plan with the merits of this bill. This proposition——

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Did Senator Bourne in his general report recommend the passage of that bill? Does he not recommend it only as an individual?

Mr. BRYAN. He makes the report and the Senator from North Carolina agrees to his report.

Mr. OVERMAN. He made a very valuable report, all of which I agreed to with that exception, but in that report he does not, I understand, recommend the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. The bill that came from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads at the last session embodying the ideas of the bill reported by the joint commission I myself introduced at the request of the chairman of the joint commission. The committee changed it in some respects. It reduced the amount of bonds to be issued. It struck out the provision that would establish a college for mechanical and electrical engineers and for road engineers. We struck out that provision. These were some things we did do, but it can not be argued that it was not in essence and substance the proposition recommended by the joint commission.

Indeed, the Senator from Georgia very frankly says that his objection to its going to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was because he was afraid that committee would come in here again recommending the Bourne plan. I do not know whether they will or not. I hope they will recommend it, but whether they do or not the Senate has control of the bill when it gets here.

This committee is entitled to have the bill referred to it and make its report upon it. If it is not to deal with the subject of post roads, then we had better strike out of the title of the committee the words "and Post Roads."

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not very familiar with the rules and precedents and practices of the Senate, having been here only a short time, but I want to know whether bills in this body are referred to a committee because of appropriateness or whether bills are referred to one committee because it is thought they will recommend it, or to another committee because it is thought they are against it and they want to kill it.

Mr. BRYAN. When such bills have been here before they have always been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, until it was demonstrated at the last session of Congress that the Senate committee, and I believe the Senate, was not in sympathy with the sort of plan worked out by the House of Representatives; and it now occurs to some gentlemen to rob the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the consideration of the subject and give it over to a committee which has no jurisdiction of the question. You might as well refer this bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, which has not had a meeting for a half century or so, and would like to have some business to dispose of.

Mr. President, I am surprised that even a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would object to this bill going to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. That committee has always had jurisdiction of the question, and the only reason for a reference to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Senator fears, will not recommend the sort of legislation he would like to see enacted.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida is absolutely mistaken as to the Bourne bill being indorsed either by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] or myself, who were members of the commission who investigated Federal aid to public roads. We had repeated meetings, at which Mr. Bourne endeavored to get the joint commission to indorse his bill. After repeated meetings we suggested a report that we would agree on, which is not the Bourne bill, but simply carrying out principles. Mr. Bourne prepared that report in accordance with what was voted on at the meeting of the joint commission. He then might have made an individual report, not as chairman of the commission but giving his own views in reference to the Bourne bill. What was indorsed by members of the commission is the report as chairman, which did not approve the Bourne bill, which purposes to sell a billion dollars of bonds issued by the Federal Government, with State bonds furnished as security.

The Senator from Florida is entirely mistaken, and if he will read the report made by Mr. Bourne as chairman of the commission, and not his individual report, he will find that he has entirely misconceived the letter of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and myself.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator why he did not draw a distinction between the individual views of Senator Bourne and the views of the chairman of the commission in his letter of indorsement of his report?

Mr. SWANSON. The letter of indorsement distinctly states your report as chairman of the commission. He brought the report here and he could not have it printed until he got a majority of the commission to approve the printing of it as a report.

Mr. BRYAN. What part is it that the Senator objected to?

Mr. SWANSON. I objected entirely to the Bourne plan as contained in it.

Mr. BRYAN. Did the Senator object to any part except chapter 2?

Mr. SWANSON. To chapter 2, the portion that criticizes the administration of executive officers.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, if the Senator objected to the other chapters, why did he not say so?

Mr. SWANSON. The Bourne bill is not indorsed in the report of the chairman. Can not the Senator from Florida understand the difference between a report made by the chairman of the joint commission and a report made by an individual member of the commission? What was said in behalf of the Bourne bill was said on the individual responsibility of Mr. Bourne. What he reported as chairman was voted upon and indorsed by the members of the commission. If the Senator will look at the report he will see that the Bourne bill was never indorsed by the commission.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have read every word of the report two or three times and I am very familiar with it. I have always understood that the joint commission, acting through Senator Bourne, submitted the result of its investigations and a report in favor of a plan allowing a State to issue bonds at 4 per cent on the credit of the United States, the Government to issue its bonds at 3 per cent, the 1 per cent difference to be compounded annually. The commission estimated that that in 50 years at compound interest would reach an amount which would pay the principal, and the bonds would be canceled.

I do not know what the Senator from Virginia did with reference to the report except what the Senator said he did at the time, and all the objection the Senator raised was because in this report chapter 2 criticizes the turning over of the affairs of the Government to the heads of executive departments.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is entirely mistaken. If that is his view, he has never read the report carefully. He has never read it if that is what he believes there is in it. Not one member of the commission, as I remember, favored the Bourne bill. They refused to indorse it. They made a report as to the necessity of good roads and as to the cost, and discussed general principles, and that is all the commission agreed on. They could not agree on a bill, because Mr. Bourne would not agree on anything else except the Bourne bill. Not another member of the commission, I think, favored it except Mr. Bourne. What the Senator has read is what Senator Bourne tried to get the commission to indorse and they refused, and are his views as an individual.

Mr. BRYAN. Did he have more influence with the commission in framing the report than the other nine members of the commission? Why did not the Senator from Virginia file a report?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will allow me, we tried to reach an agreement on all matters we could agree on, to have as much agreement as possible. If my recollection is right, we had a joint session and we decided all things we could agree on, but not on the Bourne bill, and we directed the chairman of the commission to draw a report in accordance with what we had agreed on. He drew a report and the report he drew, with the exception stated, he reported as chairman, not as an individual, was approved by the Senator from North Carolina and myself. It does not contain the remotest indorsement of the Bourne bill. I understand there was but one member there who favored it, and he reserved the right to make an individual report. If the Senator read about the Bourne bill, it was the individual views of Senator Bourne as an individual member and not as chairman. Now, that is clear, and all the Senator has to do to ascertain it is to read the proceedings.

Mr. BRYAN. What part of the report does the Senator indorse?

Mr. SWANSON. I indorse the report he made as chairman, that he was directed to make by a majority of the commission, not as an individual.

Mr. BRYAN. What part is that?

Mr. SWANSON. It is here.

Mr. BRYAN. What is that?

Mr. SWANSON. It just discussed general principles that ought to be followed and does not approve the Bourne bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am interested in the disagreement between the two Senators. I want to ask the Senator from Virginia if there is in the document which has been read any report signed by Senator Bourne as chairman of the commission?

Mr. SWANSON. I think he reserved the right to make a report as an individual. I do not know whether he submitted it or not. He brought his report here as chairman. It was made in pursuance of an agreement between the three members on the part of the Senate. The report of the chairman has been indorsed, with the exception of a certain section in reference to its execution.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that statement; but it seems to me the only way for those of us who are not familiar with the proceedings of that commission to find exactly what the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Carolina indorsed would be to have some notion of the report that they indorsed.

Mr. SWANSON. The report is filed here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I would ask the Senator what portion of the report did he except from his approval of that particular report?

Mr. SWANSON. The portion in connection with the reflection on the executive departments of the Government and their uselessness in enforcing it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That also appears in the report of the chairman?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; and the report was approved with that exception. Then, as an individual, he reserved the right to make a report. I do not know whether he filed that report or not.

Mr. BRYAN. There is no individual report shown here. I get my information only from the body of the document.

Mr. SWANSON. Let the Senator get the report of the chairman. That is not the report. That is the evidence and all.

Mr. BRYAN. No, sir; this is the report.

Mr. SWANSON. There is nothing here.

Mr. BRYAN. This is all the report in evidence here.

Mr. SWANSON. There is nothing there.

Mr. BRYAN. It is the Report of the Joint Commission on Federal Aid for the Construction of Post Roads.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have the Senator find a report made by Mr. Bourne as chairman of the commission that indorsed the Bourne bill. Let the Senator find it. The Senator said that he has read it. Now, let him find it.

Mr. BRYAN. Here is the letter signed by the chairman.

Mr. SWANSON. Find the report.

Mr. BRYAN. This is a part of the report.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has stated that that report indorsed the Bourne bill. Now, find the portion of the report that indorses it.

Mr. BRYAN. I will do it right now.

MY DEAR SIR: We have read the report submitted to us by you, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Federal Aid in the Construction of Post Roads, for our consideration, and we take this opportunity of expressing our approval of the report, with the exception of some parts of chapter 2.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, let the Senator find where the report recommends the Bourne bill.

Mr. BRYAN. The Bourne bill is not there.

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is not in the report that we approved. Find the Bourne bill. It is not here.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Virginia said he approved all except chapter 2. I do not know——

Mr. SWANSON. What was submitted to me did not contain any approval or recommendation of the Bourne bill. There is no part of it that recommends it. The Senator can not find it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield to me just a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator can not find it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Did the report the Senator refers to as the report of the chairman of the commission contain chapter 2?

Mr. SWANSON. It contained chapter 2. Here is the report.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator has just said that that is not the report.

Mr. SWANSON. The report contains what is done in Russia, what is done in France, what is done in England, what is done in various States. It gives the evidence, and then it contains the recommendation. The recommendation does not approve or recommend the passage of the Bourne bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, will the Senator please read chapter 2 of the report to which he has just referred which does not recommend the passage of the bill?

Mr. SWANSON. It would take about two days to read the report.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I am thoroughly serious. The Senator says there were two reports and two statements, one made by Senator Bourne as an individual and the other made by Senator Bourne as chairman of the commission. Now, he says in his letter to Senator Bourne that he approved of all parts of his report except chapter 2. I should like to have the Senator call our attention to what chapter 2 is to which he objected in the report of the chairman of the commission.

Mr. SWANSON. It is on the desirability of Congress to control. Senator Bourne desired that the improvement of public roads should be controlled, as I understand it, by a joint committee of the House and Senate. That was contained is his report, and we objected to any joint control by the House and Senate in improving roads.

If the Senator will permit me, this report contains every bill that has been introduced in the House and Senate, and all the laws of all the different States. It has the Shackleford bill in it and the Bourne bill, but none of them were approved. No recommendation was made as to the adoption of any bill because the commission could not jointly agree on a plan to submit to Congress. If the Senator from Florida will read it, he will find that all the bills were not approved. No recommendation was made of the Bourne bill any more than of the Shackleford bill, and the joint commission made no recommendation for the Shackleford bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Bourne reserved the right to make an individual report. Whether he filed that report or had it printed I do not know, but I recall that he reserved the right to make a report as an individual member of the commission.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I must be very obtuse, but I understand that the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Carolina agreed with some report made by the commission with certain reservations. Is that correct?

Mr. SWANSON. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Now, I am trying to get at what the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Caroline did agree to and did believe was a good thing.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will listen, we agreed to certain principles. First, that there ought to be Federal aid. We agreed as to the necessity and importance of it. We agreed to report as to what it would cost generally throughout the country, upon investigations as to the cost of carrying products overland per ton on bad roads. When we came to fix up a specific bill as to whether it should be the Bourne bill, the Shackleford bill, the Overman bill, or the Swanson bill or any bill, no conclusion was reached. No recommendation was made for a specific bill, and the report recommends no particular bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know; but what I am trying to get at is, where is the published thing?

Mr. SWANSON. Here it is [exhibiting].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, does the Senator agree with all that?

Mr. SWANSON. We agree with all that, except chapter 2; that is, the report portion of it. If the Senator will permit me, evidence was brought in, facts were brought in, letters were brought in—and it is an accumulation of what was before us without a recommendation of any bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that lots of things went on before the committee, all of which are included within the leaves of that publication?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But did the Senator mean, in the letter which he and the Senator from North Carolina signed, that they agreed to all of the things contained there, except the specific chapter 2?

Mr. OVERMAN. We agreed to just what the letter says.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I can not find what the letter says. That is what I am trying to get some information about.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will take the report before him, he can ascertain very definitely what was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator says that was not the report.

Mr. SWANSON. No, I did not. I said it was not the recommendation of the report.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me this discussion has wandered far afield. The question is whether or not this bill ought to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I should like to hear the Senator from Virginia discuss that. We are not discussing the merits of any particular bill—that is, such a discussion is not in order at this time. It is a question of whether or not the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is the proper committee to consider legislation of this character.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I simply rose as a matter of personal privilege on that phase of the matter, to state that the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] was mistaken when he stated that he had the impression that I had ever indorsed by any method, by a report of otherwise, a recommendation for the passage of the Bourne bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest that that ought to be declared a draw.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, I will say that I did not mention his attitude. He flung that in.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, he read the letter of the Senator from North Carolina and myself and tried to impress on the Senate that that letter conveyed an approval of the Bourne bill, which was not included in the recommendation of the report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator did not do so, that is all right.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I stand by the letter.

Mr. BRYAN. I had not mentioned the rather remarkable position of the Senator from Virginia on this proposition, because I was unable to ascertain what it was. The Senator from Virginia himself said he never approved it. Who approved it? I said the Senator from Virginia did. I will read his letter. That is the way it got in. I did not mention the Senator from Virginia at all until he brought in the question of his position.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Florida made this mistake: I was a member, on the part of the Senate, of the joint committee to investigate good roads. The Senator said that committee had approved the Bourne bill. I said that it had not; that it had made no recommendation; and that he was mistaken in that statement. Then the Senator read the letter.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. SWANSON. He read the letter of the Senator from North Carolina and myself approving the report. Then I said that that report made no recommendation approving the Bourne bill, which is true; and the Senator can not find that the Senator from North Carolina and myself have ever approved the Bourne bill. We have always antagonized it.

Mr. President, the issue is as to the reference of this bill. I was not in the Chamber, and did not know until after it had occurred, that the bill had been referred to the Agricultural Committee. I shall vote not to discharge that committee; I shall vote for this bill to stay in the Agricultural Committee. The Agricultural Committee reported a bill last year for Federal aid to good roads not in accordance with the Bourne bill. I believe, if you are going to get any legislation at this session of Congress for road improvement, unless you are desirous of supporting the Bourne bill, that you can get it better and easier through the Agricultural Committee.

These bills are for road improvement. It would not be advisable to discharge a committee which is favorable to a bill from its consideration and to send it to a committee which is not as favorable to it. I believe from the experience of last year, if this bill is sent back to the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee, it will be reported back with the Bourne bill as a substitute. I have seen no changes in the committee that would justify a different view. If you want the Bourne bill reported favorably, which proposes to sell $1,000,000,000 worth of bonds, and not have a practical plan for road improvements, vote to discharge this committee from the consideration of the bill and send it to the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee; and I am apprehensive that that will be the result, though there are many members of the committee who do not favor the Bourne bill.

Senators, this issue is distinct; it is clear; it is specific. If you favor a bill somewhat on the lines of the House bill, if you want the Federal Government to aid roads and to make an appropriation accordingly, the place for this bill at this session of Congress is with the Agricultural Committee. If you want the matter delayed, if you want it jeopardized, send the bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I fear that we shall be wrangling there for six months before we get any legislation of any kind or character reported.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for one moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the criticism the Senator from Virginia makes of the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee is not justified. I do not think it is altogether good legislative ethics—it is hardly fair to send a bill to a committee without reference to the subject matter treated in the bill because the committee to which it is referred is leaning toward or against the bill. Committees are created to perform a certain function, and I maintain they should act with the same poise and patriotic purposes which characterize the courts in the performance of their duties. Now, the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee, as I understand it, is the committee to which all legislation or proposed legislation of this character has heretofore been referred.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. SWANSON. No; the Senator from Mississippi is mistaken.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Listen just one moment, and then the Senator can correct me. Of course I may be mistaken in this, that this bill was not sent to that committee because Senators favorable to the bill had an idea that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was favorable to it and that possibly the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee was not; but if Senators want to pass a bill to which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is not favorable, but which should go to the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee because of the subject matter of the bill, after the committee has been given an opportunity to act upon it, if it fails to report the bill the proper course to pursue would be to discharge that committee from the consideration of it and then let the Senate deal with it.

I want to say to the Senator in this connection that I am very desirous of having good-roads legislation enacted at this session. I think there is a great deal of virtue and merit in the Bourne bill. I think the plan embodied in that bill is almost ideal; but if I find that I can not get that, then I am going to take the next best thing; but I think, under the Constitution and under the rules and the precedents of the Senate, that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is entitled to consider this bill and that it ought to be recommitted to that committee. This is not the time, however, to discuss the relative merits of the bills.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported a bill for good roads at the last session of Congress. Most bills of this character have been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but, under the rules of the Senate, there is no specific designation for the reference of a bill, except in the case of general appropriation bills, which must be referred to the Appropriations Committee. Bills relating to naval appropriations and naval matters the rules specify shall be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and bills proposing appropriations for the Army and relating to the Army are referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; but, outside of that, the Senate has absolute control of the reference of bills introduced, and the rules are silent as to where bills shall be referred except, as I have said, in the case of general appropriation bills and the other bills which I have instanced.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SWANSON. In a moment. With these exceptions, the question of reference has been left to the Senate, so that the Senate in its wisdom can refer bills to committees that are in accord with the opinions and desires of the Senate.

I am a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I think the legislation itself is more important than pride of committee. If the bill goes to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I can have nothing to do with it until it reaches the floor of the Senate. As I have said, I am a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but more important than that the bill should go to that committee or that any particular committee should have control of this matter is the fact that it should go to a committee that would be favorable to the legislation desired.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield now.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator has introduced a couple of good-roads bills himself at this session, has he not?

Mr. SWANSON. I have.

Mr. HARDWICK. He had them referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, had he not?

Mr. SWANSON. I had.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all.

Mr. SWANSON. I have a right to suggest the reference of the bills, and if the Senate does not interpose it is proper for them to go to the committee I may indicate; but the position I take is that the Senate, by its rules, has in the case of only five or six general appropriation bills designated where they shall go. The rules provide to which committees those bills shall be referred; but the reference of other bills is left entirely to the Senate to determine.

I believe that if this bill goes to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, it will go to a committee that is more friendly to road legislation than is the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and at this time to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the consideration of the bill and refer it to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I believe would retard, if not injure, the chances of such legislation. That is the reason I shall vote not to discharge the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Virginia if he is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. SWANSON. I am not.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator has devoted three years at hard work to the preparation of this report. In the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads we could have the benefit of his research, but the Senator can not get that before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the committee that had charge of a bill of this kind at the last session had that valuable information. We were wrangling over it about three or four months, and when action was taken a majority reported the Bourne bill, which provided for a sale of $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. BRYAN. I have no doubt that was partially induced by the report that the Senator joined in.

Mr. SWANSON. There was no report recommending the Bourne bill. I should like to have the Senator find such a report. He seems now to be suggesting what he has taken back.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia one question. Does he not feel sure that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry understands the measure that his subcommittee reported to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads at the last session and will give it most favorable consideration? I believe I was on the subcommittee with him.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the rules of the Senate, the Senate has a right to dispose of the reference of this bill. There is no rule requiring the reference of this bill to any particular committee; and, as I understand, the question now is whether it shall be referred to a committee more favorable to the legislation or to a committee that is, as constituted, less favorable to it. With that view, I shall vote against discharging the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at the time this discussion began. Consequently I do not know what was said with reference to the report to which the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has referred; but I hold in my hand the bill which has been passed by the House and which has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body. The chairman of that committee is out of the city; and it seems to me that, pending his return, this matter ought to go over. But outside of that, Mr. President, when I look at this bill, I can not see how anyone can doubt that the appropriate committee to consider it is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a statement just here, reference having been made to the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the city, I desire to say that the question came up in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads as to the re-reference of this bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The suggestion was made that members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry should be seen before any motion was made on the floor of the Senate to re-refer the bill. I myself went to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and apprised him of what had been done in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I am not prepared to say whether he was in favor of the bill being re-referred or whether he was against it; but I am prepared to say that he was thoroughly apprised of the pending action. He was informed that it would be taken in the next few days, if not the approximate date. I simply desired to make that statement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I feel that just at this moment I should also make a statement. I conferred with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] yesterday, a few moments before he left, and he expressed to me his opposition to referring the bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I told him what we intended to do and that I thought the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. He said he did not think so, and would antagonize such a reference. I merely want to make the statement. I think it is due the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senate that I should.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, what is this bill and what does it contain that would indicate that it should be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads as against the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry? It is entitled "An act to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter."

Mr. President, all through this bill the machinery to be used is that of the Agricultural Department. I do not see where the Post Office Department would have any jurisdiction with respect to the matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will.

Mr. HARDWICK. The power to appropriate at all depends on the power to construct and maintain post roads, does it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Democratic platform so states.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The right to regulate interstate commerce is just as clearly a Federal right.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the principle the Senator is pledged to support, and that I am pledged to support as members of the Democratic Party, is to aid in the establishment and improvement of post roads.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Post roads also may be involved.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, interstate roads may be post roads.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; a post road may be a part of an interstate road.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to one fact in connection with the position which he has taken, and that is that, although post roads may be involved, is it not true that all the machinery of the Government with reference to the improvement of roads is in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly, it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that there is now a bureau in that department, and the work contemplated by the bill, although it may be upon post roads, will be done by the Agricultural Department and under the supervision of a bureau now established in that department which comes constantly before the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, the power that the Agricultural Department has is merely a power created by statute, and we might change it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, would it not be necessary to reverse our entire policy in the past, take the Bureau of Roads away from the Agricultural Department, break up all we have done there in the line of developing experts in road building, and transfer them to the Post Office Department? Ought not the bill to go to the committee which supervises the department that does the work?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in this bill the references to the Agricultural Department are numerous. For instance, it provides—

> The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost, and determine what would be the reasonable cost of such proposed improvements—

And so forth.

Again it provides—> that upon receipt of such written statement the said State highway department may transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture a statement in writing notifying him that such proposed construction, improvement, or maintenance will be undertaken upon the terms proposed.

Another provision is this:

> That when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that said construction, improvement, or maintenance of said road has been finished in compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications he shall cause to be paid to the proper authority of said State whatever remains unpaid of the amount which he has stated, as hereinbefore provided, would be given to aid said State in said proposed construction, improvement, or maintenance of said road.

Again it is provided—> that the Secretary of Agriculture may make, or cause to be made, such inspection and examinations of any road constructed, improved, or maintained.

Again the bill provides—> that the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time make payments upon such construction, improvement, or maintenance as the same progresses.

There is no reference to the Post Office Department in this bill. There is no indication whatever that the Post Office Department shall have any connection with it whatever, and it does not seem to me that this bill should be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads when it is a bill that is confined solely and purely in administration, in the making of contracts, in the completing of contracts, and in approving the same, to the Secretary of Agriculture. It seems to me the only committee to which it should be referred is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I suggest to him that an additional reason is found beginning in line 9, on page 6, where this provision is set forth:

> One of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; Mr. President. I do not see that that contains anything that would make it a Post Office matter. There is no reference——

Mr. BRYAN. I was suggesting that as an additional reason why it should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am glad to have the cooperation of the Senator from Florida. It seems to me that this is a bill which should be kept in the Agricultural Department; and I feel that the matter ought not to be disposed of in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I trust the Senate will not act upon the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that this matter be postponed or put over until the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may return. I understand the probabilities are that he will be absent from the Chamber for two or three weeks, and I think there is very strong reason why this legislation should be speeded rather than retarded.

I do not see any reason why we should wait for the chairman. His wishes are not to control in this matter. The wishes of the Senate are to control. I believe the Senate desires to get this bill upon the calendar in time to give a reasonable chance for action upon it at this session of Congress.

What I am interested in is in getting this matter before the Senate. Of course, I want, as does every other friend of the measure, a favorable report; but I want to get it on the calendar in due time so that it will not be again, as it has been heretofore, crowded out by other legislation.

Ordinarily I agree with the statement which has been made that all matters should be in the first instance referred to the appropriate committee under our rules and under our practice. I would not, ordinarily, vote to take a matter from a committee that is clearily entitled to it and give it to another committee for the purpose of securing a favorable report or more expeditious action. But, Mr. President, it is clear to my mind from reading this bill that the bill is, to say the least, as appropriately referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as it would be to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. In fact, as the Senator from Colorado has suggested, I think it is more appropriate to refer it to the former committee.

I do not undertake to say whether or not the bill confers powers that we can not under the Constitution confer. I do not think it is necessary now to discuss the question of power at all. The question is where the bill should go as it is written. It may be that the bill is so written as not to make a proper basis of power for congressional action; but the determination of the question of what committee it should go to must depend upon what the bill provides and proposes and not upon whether or not it violates a constitutional provision.

I thought when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] read a little while ago from the preamble that that was a mere general, loose statement of the purposes of the bill, such as we frequently find in preambles; but I find that the very first enacting section of the bill repeats verbatim the preamble, and the purpose of the legislation is declared to be a specifically rural and agricultural purpose. It is declared to be "in order to promote agriculture." I think Congress has power to appropriate money for that purpose. It is declared to be "to afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products." I think Congress has power to appropriate money for that purpose.

Those are declared to be the purposes of the bill. That is the express, specific declaration, the legislative intent and purpose. Then follows, Mr. President, the declaration that when these roads have been constructed for that purpose they "may" be used for the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal routes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that in arriving at the amounts to be allotted to the States, after an appropriation of $65,000 to each State, the balance is to be divided equally upon the basis of population and upon the basis that the total amount of mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such States bears to the mileage of the whole country of rural free delivery and star mail routes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not saying, Mr. President, that we do not want this legislation in part for postal purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. I am pointing out to the Senator that one-half of this money is to be spent on rural post roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt in the world that that is, in part, the purpose of the bill; but the point I am making is, that the declared purpose is to promote agriculture and to afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products; and then, after the road is built for that purpose, it is declared that it "may" be put to the Federal uses enumerated, one of them being for postal routes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one-half of it is on account of census population. We are not going to refer it to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should think not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because it is to be administered in the Agricultural Department; because it is to be administered under an arm of the Government that reports to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; that discusses its work annually with the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and the whole work will be done in connection with that committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. The declaration is made that after they are built for agricultural purposes these roads may be used in interstate commerce and for military purposes or for postal routes—and, by the way, the only reference to postal routes or to the Post Office Department, so far as I have seen, is contained in those two words, "postal routes." All the balance of the bill is with reference to things that are to be done by the Agricultural Department with the machinery that we have prepared by law for doing the work that department is authorized and directed to do under this bill.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida is going to take the position that this bill must go to the Post Office Committee because it says that these roads may be used as postal roads, you might just as well take the position that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce because it says they may be used in interstate commerce. You might as well take the position that it has to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs because it says the roads may be used for military purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, what is the necessity, then, of having a Committee on Roads at all in the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I might with equal pertinence ask the Senator what is the necessity of having a Committee on Interstate Commerce and a Committee on Military Affairs or a Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, they have other things to consider. This committee deals only with post offices and post roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the necessity for having a Committee on Agriculture if you are going to refer to the Post Office Committee a bill that the Agricultural Department is required by the law, and by its terms, to administer?

Mr. BRYAN. I think there is a very easy answer to that. This is the only committee of the Senate that deals with roads, and its only purpose is to deal with post offices and post roads.

In the case of one-half of this money, the amount is to be arrived at by the proportion of the mileage of free-delivery routes that the mails are carried over in each State.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I would agree with the Senator if the road was being built entirely and exclusively for the purpose of postal routes and nothing else. Then the Post Office Committee would be the only committee of the Senate that would have jurisdiction of it. But it is to be built for other purposes as well as that, and that is not the biggest purpose declared in this bill. So far as the declaration of the purpose of the bill is concerned—I mean the literal, technical declaration of purpose—it is not the most important thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Since the name "Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads" was given to that committee, has there ever been an appropriation made by that committee for the construction and repair of a road?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have not been on the committee during the whole of its existence.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, since the Senator has been on it.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not sure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I will answer that question, if the Senator will permit me. The first and only appropriation that I recall by any committee for the purpose of aiding in the construction of good roads was favorably reported by the Post Office Committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many such appropriations were made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Only one.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Only one. That committee has been in existence for 50 or 60 years, has it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I mean that was in the last two or three years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I supposed that the word "roads" meant regulating the railroads with relation to mail. That is what I had always supposed was referred to by the word "roads" in connection with that committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I recall the measure to which the Senator from Alabama has just referred. It was reported by the Post Office Committee; but that was a measure that distinctly concerned itself with building experimental roads for the purpose of obtaining information on the part of the Government as to whether by these modern type roads the Government could effect greater economy in the delivery of our star routes and rural routes mail service.

Mr. President, as I said a little while ago, nowhere in this bill, so far as I have been able to discover, is there any reference to the Post Office Department in connection with the prosecution of the work. The Secretary of Agriculture initiates the whole thing. He decides about the routes, where the money shall be appropriated and expended, whether it shall be used at all, and then it must be used under his supervision.

I think I would be the last one to impugn the purposes of the Post Office Committee. In the first instance I might have had no objections to the bill going to the Post Office Committee, but it was not sent to the Post Office Commitee; it was sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is a member of that committee, assures the Senate that the committee has the bill now under consideration and is at work on it. I do not know whether the Senator said there had been hearings on it or not, but he said the committee had begun work upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill was read and studied, and certain additional bills were sent for; and it was before the committee when the Senate met, and we had to adjourn to come to the floor. It is the first measure to come up at the next meeting of the committee, each member having been requested to study certain additional bills in order that we might act upon it first at the next meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And amendments have been suggested?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Again, it has been suggested that the Post Office Committee is wedded to a different character of legislation with respect to this subject. The Post Office Committee, I understand, has heretofore shown its hostility to a measure of like sort. The Agricultural Committee is supposed to be favorable.

Having those facts before me, believing that in the first instance this bill could have been appropriately referred to either committee, but in my judgment more appropriately referred to the Agricultural Committee, and since it has been referred to that committee, being interested in the legislation and a speedy report, and believing we are more likely to get a quicker and a favorable report from that committee than from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, having a right to exercise a choice, because the bill could be appropriately referred to either one of these committees, in these circumstances I would unhesitatingly exercise that choice in favor of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to make a statement just here?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator said that the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee was opposed to this bill and wedded to some other measure. I want to state, as one member of the committee—and I think there are others who have the same attitude toward it that I have—that the object was to get the most efficient legislation we could in reference to this matter, without any prejudice for or against any bill.

I admit that on account of absence in 1914, and last year in view of the fact that we were not in session, I have not had an opportunity to study all the provisions of the several bills that came before the committee; but I am of opinion that in view of the parcel post and its direct relation to the rural communities and the emphasis that has been placed upon it; the members of that committee are as heartily in favor of doing all that can be done legitimately for the benefit of the rural communities as are the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I am a member of both committees; and my attitude would be that, as has been pointed out here, this commission was appointed for the purpose of gathering data, and its report was made to the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee. Its members had full and definite knowledge of all the circumstances that are essential in providing for a proper bill. I do not think the question should come before the Senate as to the attitude of a committee which has concurrent jurisdiction, so to speak. The Agricultural Committee has the interests of the rural communities at heart. The Post Office Committee preeminently has the same interests at heart, and the means of reaching the end are identical.

It seems to me that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, if it does its duty, should take every one of these bills and investigate which would best serve the purpose for which the legislation is intended; and I, as a member of both committees—the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—would work just as heartily on the matter without regard to which committee it came before. Whatever bills are there, it seems to me it is the duty of each and every member to take the merits of the bill, and not be wedded to one system as against another or in favor of one bill as against another bill. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is interested in this matter, and I collaborated with him, to the extent of the little opportunity I had, along the very lines that are here set forth in the Shackleford bill. I gave what aid I could at that time to that bill.

In view of the fact that the appropriation is to be administered by the Post Office Department, and in view of the work that department is to do, especially in regard to the parcel post, it seems to me that the Post Office Committee is preeminently the committee to which bills of this character should be referred. Then, if the Senate sees fit, because of prejudice for or against a bill, because of its authorship, or because of what it contains, to amend it here, it has the perfect right to amend any form of good-roads bill in conformity with what it desires, whether it comes from the Agricultural Committee or whether it comes from the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee. As these bills heretofore have been discussed by the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee, and the commission was appointed from that committee, I think that is the proper place for the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one remark was made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] to which I call attention. He said that by some "sharp trick" this bill reached the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I hardly think he meant what he said. So far as I know, there were several of us watching, intending to move that it be sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I was, but did not get an opportunity to make the motion, because it was laid before the Senate when I was called to the Marble Room, and it was referred to that committee by the Presiding Officer without a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was the trickster.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should think it would have been so referred because of the title, no matter what the bill contained.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly; and when we get to the substance of the bill, unquestionably the more you study the substance of the bill the more clearly the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry should be charged with its consideration.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 381.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I notice a misprint in the reprint of the Philippine bill. It appears in line 3, page 36. It reads that "the President shall reserve or acquire such lands and rights and privileges appurtenant thereto as may, in his judgment, be required by the United States for naval bases and coaling stations within the territory of said Philippines." The word "shall" appears in the original amendment. It was amended in the Senate by striking out "shall" and inserting the word "may," so as to read "the President may reserve or acquire," and so forth. I take it for granted that that amendment appears in the official copy. If there is any doubt about it, I direct the attention of the chairman to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). The Secretary informs the Chair that in the original amendment the word is "may" instead of "shall."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all; I wanted it understood that the word is "may."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The sum of $20,000,000 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the President, through the Philippine Commission, in aid of the instruction of the Filipinos in a common language, in the principles of free government, and in industrial pursuits; and also in aid of an agricultural bank in the Philippines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Husting	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	James	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Stone
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Clapp	Jones	Page	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Phelan	Thomas
Colt	La Follette	Pittman	Underwood
Cummins	Lane	Poindexter	Vardaman
Curtis	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Wadsworth
du Pont	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Walsh
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Gallinger	Lippitt	Shafroth	Williams
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard
Harding	McLean	Simmons
Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. This statement will stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have the Secretary state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. The sum of $20,000,000 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the President, through the Philippine Commission, in aid of the instruction of the Filipinos in a common language, in the principles of free government, and in industrial pursuits; and also in aid of an agricultural bank in the Philippines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to perfect the amendment by substituting the sum of "$10,000,000" for "$20,000,000" and by adding after the words "agricultural bank" the words "and aid of irrigation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has a right to modify his amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before that amendment is submitted I wish to say that the people of this country by the thousands need the help of this Government both in securing Federal aid in credit and in educational matters. I do not think it is going to make much difference to them whether the Moros talk the English language or whether they continue to speak their own, or whether a Moro has 400 wives or 1 or none; if he annexes the larger number, the joke will be upon him and not upon us. I am willing to let him fight it out himself. The people of this country need aid, and no money need be appropriated for a people who would be glad to pay an equal sum to get us out of their country. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words regarding the amendment I have offered. I assume that it is the desire of every Senator on this floor that the United States should withdraw from the Philippine Islands with credit. Yesterday I stated, and it is well known to the Senate, that the training of the Filipino people in a common language had not yet been accomplished; that it would be utterly impossible for them to conduct self-government without being able to communicate to each other their ideas in a common language, and that whilst much had been done in this direction, much remains to be done. I think that under existing conditions, as we propose to withdraw from those islands within a period at the most of five years, we should apply a little pressure to the matter of training, and inasmuch as the Filipino people themselves have not sufficient insular or municipal revenues to take care of this matter we ought to add ten or twenty million dollars to the billion dollars which we have already expended, directly and indirectly, in connection with the Philippines in advancing this laudable purpose.

I have received a memorandum from the Insular Bureau regarding the things that might well be done to aid the Filipinos in preparation for the tremendous struggle that will come when the connection between those islands and this protecting Government is cut. I find that I was mistaken in saying that the sum of only $2,000,000 annually is now employed in those islands in the education of 500,000 children out of a total of 2,000,000 children. I find that the total sum of $3,400,000 is being spent, of which about $1,000,000 comes from municipal government and the rest comes from the provincial government and the central government. That means about $7 a head, whereas in this country we expend about $30 a head, and as I stated yesterday only 500,000 out of the 2,000,000 children of school age are being educated. It is suggested by the Insular Bureau that the sum of $1,000,000 a year for five years might well be added to this expenditure.

The memorandum which I have received states what would be done in an intensive way would be the employment of competent teachers, and those teachers must be Americans, because all the competent Filipino teachers who are available are now employed.

> Particularly should these teachers be Americans, if intensive instruction in the English language is to be undertaken.
>
> It has been heretofore found practicable to maintain in the islands several hundred more American teachers than are at present so employed.
>
> The money therefore which could be used intelligently and to advantage, without involving the Philippine Government in future expenditures, would be very largely by the employment of American teachers very much as they are at present employed—teachers of domestic science, teachers of manual training, teachers of agriculture—all of whom, in addition, could be teachers of English.
> The amount of money that could be expended for this purpose would be approximately $1,000,000 per annum. This is assuming that the Philippine Government would continue its own expenditures for education, which, of course, we would insist upon.

I assume, of course, that under the power given to the President, he would see that this sum of $1,000,000 per annum in the training of the Filipino people would be added to the expenditure now being annually made by the Filipinos.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator here why he designates a common language. His argument would indicate the English language.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he proposes to instruct them in the English language, why does he not say so, instead of using the words "a common language"?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no objection to a change in the wording.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not know but the Senator had in mind practicing upon the Filipinos the new Volupuk language, or whatever it is called.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I assume, of course, that they will continue the use of the English language. A very large proportion of the Filipino people are now trained in it. I presume that perhaps a fourth or perhaps a fifth of the Filipino people can speak, more or less perfectly or imperfectly, the English language.

With reference to agriculture and lands the Insular Bureau declares that—

> The two great needs of agriculture are land surveys, so that titles may be registered and title to public land acquired readily, and irrigation.

These are the two wants.

I am surprised to receive a statement from the Insular Bureau that the estimate of expenditures for surveys will be $25,000,000. I think that sum is so large, possibly, Congress would not be willing to appropriate it, though I recall that when I was there one of the chief difficulties, with reference to the lands of the islands, was the fact that there had been no adequate surveys, that the boundaries of existing holdings were not accurately defined, and that it was difficult, if not impossible, in making grants of public lands to give any adequate description of their location, and also that the registration of title was so imperfect as to make the acquisition of lands there very difficult. I would not expect to cover the subject of surveys in this appropriation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are two things about the amendment concerning which I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada, for I do not understand their application or connection with the bill that is under consideration. The Senator in his amendment provides that the money shall be expended through the Philippine Commission. The bill, not considering the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, abolishes the Philippine Commission. What agency does the Senator from Nevada expect to employ in the expenditure of the money?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In that case I would suggest to substitute the word "government" for "commission."

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a Philippine Legislature established by the bill that takes the place of the Philippine Commission; that is, there is a senate or a higher legislative body that is substituted for the Philippine Commission. Does the Senator expect that the Philippine Legislature will take this money and use it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course the bill does not abolish the office of Governor General. The Governor General will continue, and he is a part of the Philippine government. So I should say that the Philippine government would consist, then, of the Governor General and the legislature.

Mr. CUMMINS. One thing more which bothers me is this: The Senate adopted an amendment yesterday which will authorize the immediate evacuation of the Philippine Islands, our departure to become complete and the sovereignty to be entirely transferred at the end of two years. The Senator does not expect all this money to be expended within two years. Now, what will become of the remainder of the money?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the bill provides that we are to withdraw in not less than two years and not more than four years.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not so understand it. The bill provides for immediate withdrawal, but says that the transfer shall not be complete until two years from this time and not more than four years, but whether it is two years or four years, the Senator from Nevada can not expect to spend all this money even within two years, and what would become of the remainder?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should expect the President of the United States to expend only such part of this appropriation as he can expend with good judgment, and if it is impossible to expend the whole there will be a balance remaining. I believe, however, that within a period of four years and possibly within a period of two years the sum of $10,000,000 could be expended to immense advantage in those islands and to the advantage of the purpose we have in view—the preparation of those people for self-government.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to suggest that I have not any doubt we could expend it in six months to the great advantage of those islands. I think there ought to be some limitation or arrangement as to just how long it is going to take to spend it. There is no trouble about spending American money over there for the benefit of the islands.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from Nevada have it in view to spend the $10,000,000 for this purpose within two years?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the President considers that it is advisable to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the President thinks it can not be expended efficiently within that time, what becomes of the remainder?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume it remains in the United States Treasury.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not the purpose of the Senator to transfer the remainder to the new government to be established there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no; I have no such purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not? Is it not just as important that they should become educated after our sovereignty ceases as before?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My view is that when they withdraw, our connection from them will absolutely cease. I want them to lead a thoroughly individualized life, not under our protection in any form. I have no objection, if the President should so advise hereafter, possibly to appropriate a specific sum for a specific purpose before we withdraw, even though the money may not be expended until after we withdraw; but it is the purpose of the amendment to expend a reasonable sum within the period of two or four years. I believe it will be impossible to accomplish the withdrawal before four years, and I have not the slightest idea but that $10,000,000 could be most profitably expended in those islands in the interest of the Philippine people.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are a great many people in our own country who need education, a great many more than are permitted to secure an education.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator believe that we ought to spend our money for our own people, if they need the money, rather than for the people of the Philippines?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where does the Senator expect to get the $20,000,000 or $10,000,000?

Mr. NEWLANDS. By additional taxation, if necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. But has the Senator any well-defined idea upon whom he will lay this additional burden of taxation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should levy additional taxes upon incomes and inheritances.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has that been matured upon the Senator's side of the Chamber?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know that it has. That is my individual opinion. I am not a member of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the Senator's individual opinion?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator's inquiry, of course, is a proper one as to whether our first duty is not to our own people. It is; but we have assumed a duty toward the Philippines. We seized those islands. We took possession of them first in a spirit of conquest. Later on we held them in a spirit of altruism and declared that we are there for the benefit of the Filipino people. The assumption of a duty of that kind requires the expenditure of some money. We have expended enormous sums in the past in military and naval expenditures necessary to suppress Filipino independence. I think we may well expend a little more in promoting it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator from Nevada state approximately how much money has been expended upon the Philippine Islands since the occupancy of the islands?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very little has been spent directly upon the Philippine Islands themselves, as I understand. There were some two or three million dollars spent when they had cholera and famine there, and I imagine there have been several million dollars spent in fortifications. Our principal expenditure was in conquering the islands and in the military enlargement both of the Army and Navy made necessary by their acquisition. The total expenditure of the whole Spanish-American War was about $600,000,000; and I think it is safe to say that the enlargement of the Army and Navy caused by our expansion territorially has been some $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 more annually.

Mr. GALLINGER. And we have spent a large sum in the building of schoolhouses, in furnishing education, and giving instruction to the Filipino children, and in the building of roads, as I read it. I do not know how much we have expended, but in the aggregate it is a very large sum.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think that expenditure came out of the Federal Treasury; I think it came out of the insular treasury.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that, I think, the total expenditure, outside of the military expenses, was less than $4,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is quite surprising to me, as I had supposed it was much greater.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Our main effort has been to make the insular revenues pay all the expenses of those islands; and from that point of view the work has been excellently done. I do not think there ever has been in the history of the world so creditable a piece of colonial administration as that exhibited in the Philippine Islands under Mr. Taft and his successors. It seems to me that the work has been done with the strictest economy and without calling upon the Federal Treasury for any purely insular demands, except the insular demands to which the Senator from Connecticut refers, involving meeting conditions of cholera and in some degree involving good roads.

Now, it is absolutely essential to those islands that they should have a proper agricultural system established. They have not one as yet. Irrigation has not been advanced as it ought to have been. We ought to have sent engineers from our Reclamation Service over there immediately after the acquisition of the islands and mapped out a scheme of irrigation, for they are dependent upon irrigation there; they can not depend upon the natural fall of the waters from the heavens.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If Japan should take the islands, why not let Japanese engineers go over there and establish an irrigation system?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, that is a rather cynical view of the matter. I do not share in the view at all that Japan should take the islands. I hope that Japan will have a proper respect for the independence and integrity of those islands, and that every other country also will. I am unwilling that this Government should assume any obligation to protect the independence of those islands; but I think that we should in every way appeal to the moral sentiment of the nations surrounding them, to the acquisitive nations of the world, to give a common protection to those islands in their struggle to maintain self-government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Nevada, however, voted, as I understand, yesterday that the United States should not interfere in any way whatever to protect them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I do not want the Government of the United States to have any problem in the Orient, involving, possibly, complications that will land us in war, the consequences of which we can not measure. I want to confine the United States practically to domestic problems, which are numerous and complicated, which involve the building up of a country that ultimately will have a population of four or five hundred million people, individual States surpassing in population in the future great empires as they exist to-day. That will be a problem which will be sufficient for us. I believe that we ought to have attended to our own affairs from the start; that we ought never to have undertaken this foreign problem; but having undertaken it, it seems the clear duty of the United States in withdrawing from the job is to do it with as much humanity and even generosity to those people as is possible.

When I was interrupted, I was speaking about irrigation. The memorandum from the Insular Bureau which I hold in my hands states:

> Irrigation: The Philippine government has several times in the past 12 years taken up this subject, but has not made considerable progress. As a result land on which three crops per year could be produced, produces with difficulty one crop, and a great deal of land is of little value which would be of immense value.
> The difficulty with undertaking hurriedly irrigation work is well recognized by all engineers experienced in that work. It would be very difficult, beginning promptly and with a large amount of money, to complete in four years irrigation works meeting the necessities of any large part of the islands without wastefulness. Generally speaking, the necessary observations preliminary to the work are lacking. These observations should cover a period of years.
> In many places the matter is complicated by the ownership of water rights, which would have to be adjusted. It is believed that if $10,000,000 were made immediately available for this purpose the amount could be intelligently expended in such a way as to justify the expenditure, producing thereafter an income to the Philippine government. This, of course, would not by any means mean that all of the necessary irrigation work in the islands would be completed. It would mean that approximately six reasonably large projects could be undertaken and concluded within four years. More than this could not be done to advantage.

I will say, with reference to that, that we have a population of 7,000,000 in those islands; we have been in possession of those islands for over 15 years; a complete system of irrigation is absolutely essential to the development of agriculture in those islands; and yet we have hardly taken the initial step toward the inauguration of a proper system. Why? Simply because it is utterly impossible to raise the revenue from insular sources. Their revenue, as I stated yesterday, is only $11,000,000 per annum, and the municipal and provincial revenues added make a total revenue of only $17,000,000. In our arid region, where perhaps in the arid and semiarid States possibly we have two or three million people, we have already expended within the last 10 years nearly $80,000,000 in irrigation works, Government works alone; but yet during that period practically nothing has been expended in the Philippine Islands.

It is utterly impossible for private capital to take hold of these enterprises. In order to take hold of an irrigation enterprise you must have control over the sources of the water; control of the water rights and of the rivers; and you must also have absolute control of a sufficient area of land to make the construction of the irrigation works profitable in the added value of the land. That is one of the reasons why our Government has entered upon these irrigation works. We have reached the limits of individual and private enterprise in that direction. So the Government was obliged to take it up. The insular government, there, however, is unable to do so. The United States ought to have undertaken it, and ought to have undertaken it 15 years ago.

I shall ask leave to put into the RECORD my statement at a hearing before the Philippines Committee on this subject many years ago, calling attention to the importance of the speedy perfection of these irrigation schemes and also to the importance of organizing an agricultural bank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The economic efficiency in the Philippine Islands has hardly been increased at all during our 15 years of stay. It has not increased, because we have applied ourselves simply to questions of government, of education, and of training, instead of to the economic development of the islands. I fear that when our protection is withdrawn and the excellent sanitation of the islands which is now being carried on under American rule is diminished we shall again have outbreaks of diseases, such as cholera and others afflicting men, and the numerous diseases so destructive of cattle and animals.

In addition to that, if those people are not put upon their feet so that the agricultural possibilities of the islands may be developed, we shall find that there will be conditions of suffering and poverty and distress that will overwhelm those islands and practically destroy everything that we have accomplished thus far in fitting them for self-government.

That view does not deter me at all, so far as I am concerned, from pursuing the fixed purpose of withdrawing from those islands as soon as possible; but the possibility of those conditions does induce me, notwithstanding there is a deficit in the Treasury, notwithstanding that we shall need large supplies of money for our military and naval preparations, and notwithstanding that it will be necessary to increase the taxation of the country, now to provide for the discharge of this moral duty which rests upon us.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the motive that moves the able and learned Senator from Nevada in his effort to confer this benefaction upon the Philippine people is a tribute to his good heart; but I want to ask the Senator if, as a trustee of the American people, many of whom are in a more indigent condition than are the people of the Philippine Islands, is it fair to take the money derived from taxing the American citizen when our own people need assistance and confer it upon the people in the Philippine Islands? It seems to me that our first obligation is to the people at home; that charity begins there. To take this money out of the pockets of the toilers of America, I repeat, many of whom are more needy and abjectly poorer than are the Filipinos, and to give it to the Filipino would not be fair.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I contend that Uncle Sam is rich enough to take care not only of his own children but also of those waifs away out in the Pacific, over whom he has, against their consent, imposed his sovereignty for nearly 20 years. I think we can take care of both of these matters, and my proposal involves no neglect of American interests.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator. He is always eloquent and instructive, but I desire to say that "Uncle Sam" has no wealth of his own. Every dollar in the National Treasury is coined of the sweat and toil of some wealth producer. "Uncle Sam" has nothing save that which is contributed by the laborers of this Republic, and it is the duty of this Congress, as trustees of the wealth producers of America, to be just rather than generous. There are thousands of poor people in the United States to-day who are quite as much in need of assistance from the Government as the people in the Philippine Islands. Personally I want to assist the Filipinos; I want to see them prosper, build up the waste places in their country. I would help them in every legitimate way possible, but my first obligation is to the people of America. When the Americans shall all be provided with the necessities of life, then I shall be glad to join with the able, patriotic, and altruistic Senator from Nevada in his efforts to promote the welfare of the Filipino.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, "Uncle Sam," of course, is a myth. When we refer to "Uncle Sam," we mean the American people. The American people have immense wealth to draw upon; no country in the world is so fortunate as is this. The American people have imposed their sovereignty upon the Filipino people, 7,000 miles away, against their will, and have killed Filipinos because they resisted their authority; and now, having pacified them, having entered upon this work of altruism and helpfulness, all I want to do is to fairly round it out, so that the world can say that the work has been performed in a creditable manner, and so that the Filipino people themselves will not have to reproach us hereafter for any act of either commission or omission.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to an agricultural bank, this report from the Insular Bureau says:

> In the way of an agricultural bank, this matter could be taken care of by the Philippine government and its present agencies, provided there were included in the pending bill a provision authorizing the Philippine government to guarantee the land-mortgage bonds issued by such bank and to pay interest and principal of such bonds in case the bank should default.

The Filipino Bank has to-day a capital of $1,500,000, and not $500,000, as I erroneously stated yesterday. That is, of course, insufficient. We are all beginning to realize in this country the necessity of agricultural banks. The question of rural credits is one of the great questions before the country to-day. We are slowly following in the steps of the European countries in this direction, whose efforts have been directed in the line of reducing the rates of interest to the producers of farm products. We all know that in this country the producers of farm products have to pay higher rates of interest than almost any other class of our people, and we are making an effort, through Government aid, through land banks and agricultural banks and rural credits, to bring the interest charged agricultural communities down to the common level of interest that is charged in manufacturing and in commerce.

The difficulties under which we suffer are, however, enormously exaggerated in the Philippine Islands. I can not pretend to state the excessive rates of interest which I heard were charged in the Philippine Islands whilst I was there, rates of interest which kept the producers within the grasp of the money lenders, so that they were in practical slavery, mortgaging one crop after another in advance of its production to the money lenders, and unable ever to get out of their control.

It seems that the Philippine Commission has urged the organization of an agricultural bank. My view was that, inasmuch as the insular revenues were not sufficient to provide a capital for such a bank, the United States ought to have established one 15 years ago; and I urged upon the Philippine Committee the establishment of a bank with a capital of $10,000,000. That was not done. So the insular government struggled feebly with the question itself, and they have utilized, I believe, their gold reserve in some way as a foundation for credit by an agricultural bank, which has a capital of only $1,500,000. It seems to me that we might well appropriate a considerable sum for this purpose. It seems to me that we can either make a gift of an adequate sum to an agricultural bank, properly guarded for this purpose, or we can make a loan which may be subsequently repaid when the insular revenue is in a condition for repayment.

The memorandum which I have received states that the pressing needs of those islands, then, for the next four years will be $4,000,000 for education, $25,000,000 for a survey, and $10,000,000 for irrigation. I eliminate the question of survey, because I do not think that Congress would be disposed to enter upon that work; but I do think that the sum of $10,000,000, put under the control of the President, to be expended by him with the aid of the Philippine government, will do a great deal in the way of providing a basis for an agricultural bank, a proper irrigation system, and for the education of those people in a common language and in industrial pursuits.

So far as the pagan people of the southern islands, numbering over a million, and the savage tribes are concerned, I have made no calculation as to their possible necessities. I think this whole matter should be left to the discretion of the President, and I have no doubt that the recommendations of the very competent insular government which we have established will be such as to insure that the money will be wisely and not foolishly expended. I trust, Mr. President, that the amendment as modified will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if I understand the purpose of this bill it is to carry out the pledge of the Democratic Party to the people of the Philippine Islands to give them their independence as soon as possible. I do not understand that the Democratic Party, or anybody else in this country, has gone so far as to promise those people or assure them anything further than that beyond what may be involved in the detailed work of carrying that policy into successful operation. Now, it is proposed, in addition to withdrawing from the islands, to endow the Philippine people with a part of the revenues of the United States and devote the sum of $20,000,000 to their uplift and improvement.

Mr. President, I have no idea that the Senate is going to indorse or adopt this amendment. At the same time I want to express my dissent from such a proposition. In this body, indeed in both Houses of Congress, we have incurred the habit of thinking in millions. When it comes to legislation a million dollars amounts to about as much in the contemplation of Congress as an expenditure of 50 cents did at the time of the formation of the Government; but nevertheless $20,000,000 is a great deal of money, especially when it is proposed to give it away.

Where will it come from? That question was very pertinently asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and the reply was that Uncle Sam is very wealthy. That is the case, Mr. President, but the Senator from Mississippi aptly replied that all the money that is used in our public expenditures comes from the people in the form of taxation, direct or indirect. The expenses of the Government are not only enormous, but if the so-called plans for preparation for national defense are to be crystalized into legislation it will be necessary to very largely increase not only our revenues but our taxation. I do not know of anybody in the United States or of any interest in the United States that likes to be taxed. My experience is that every interest wants taxation to be borne by other interests, and of course there is a mutuality of objection which makes all forms of proposed revenue legislation extremely disagreeable and annoying to those charged with the duty of its enactment.

I wish I could see somewhere some evidence of an intention to limit our expenses, instead of constantly increasing them. I would just as soon think of taking $20,000,000 in connection with this bill and putting it in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean as to give it to those people after we have given them their independence or while this proposed law is in process of operation. I do not care personally whether the Filipinos are educated or not; I do not care whether their irrigation systems are completed or not. That is a matter which they must themselves look after when they have been freed from subjection to this country and begin to work out their own destiny.

Personally it makes little difference to me whether Japan takes possession of them or not, or whether some other nation goes and exercises there direct control or suzerainty over them. I think we should get out of there, and get out of there as speedily as possible. The islands have cost us hundreds of millions of dollars; and now it is proposed by this amendment virtually to make them a present of $2 a piece as a sort of premium, I suppose, or a tip, to accompany our final adieu. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Husting	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	James	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Norris	Sterling

Fall	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Walsh
Fletcher	Lodge	Shafroth	Warren
Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Harding	McLean	Shields
Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, before a vote is taken I should like to perfect this amendment by striking out the words "through the Philippine Commission." I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to perfect his own amendment. That is agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then those words are stricken out. I will now ask the Secretary to read the amendment as perfected.

I wish to state, before the vote is taken, that the withdrawal from the Philippines means an immense saving of expenditures hereafter in the complications in the Orient that will be sure to arise out of our holding those islands; that in addition to that it means the saving of an expenditure of at least $25,000,000 in military and naval expense annually; and that out of these savings the United States may well appropriate $10,000,000 toward training these people in a common language, principles of free government, and industrial pursuits, and in aid of an agricultural bank and of irrigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as perfected by the Senator from Nevada.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the President in aid of the instruction of the Filipinos in a common language, in the principles of free government, and in industrial pursuits, and also in aid of an agricultural bank and in aid of irrigation in the Philippines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is a statesmanlike forecast of the probable results of the action recently taken by the Senate, indicating a purpose to withdraw from the Philippines; and sooner or later, and in some connection, some provision of that kind must be seriously considered.

The bill now under consideration, however, is a bill of policies and not a bill of details, nor an appropriation bill. The pecuniary provision for the Philippine Islands is made in the sundry civil appropriation bill. It is altogether likely that if the bill now pending shall be passed by the House of Representatives, the situation thus presented will commend itself to the Committee on Appropriations, and some such provision as that indicated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada can be made.

I believe that the amendment adds complications to those that are already sufficiently numerous to tax the patience of the Senate in the consideration of the bill. For that reason alone I feel that I must vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and for that reason withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If I were at liberty to vote—if he were here—I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CATRON. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, and as he has not voted I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to vote, but I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and in his absence withhold my vote. I should like to vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Jones	Newlands	Saulsbury	Wadsworth

NAYS—67.

So Mr. NEWLANDS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I shall not accept this vote as a test of the altruism, the benevolence, and the philanthropy of the American people, of which we have heard so much during this debate. I shall invite the attention of the President to this subject in the hope that at some time he will make a recommendation to Congress upon it. If that is not forthcoming, I shall press it upon appropriation bills or other legislation in the future, in the hope that Senators like the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who think that this is not the proper place for an appropriation of this kind, but who perhaps are in sympathy with its purpose, will join with me in seeing that we do something in the few remaining years that we have to fit the Filipino people more effectually for the intellectual and economic struggle that is before them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Nevada that he would secure a powerful influence in favor of his amendment if he could attach to the Clarke amendment a proviso that it shall not go into effect until his amendment is adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I await the reading of the next amendment, assuming that it is one I presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That before the independence and sovereignty of the Philippine Islands shall be proclaimed by the President of the United States the government of the Philippine Islands as constituted shall make and execute a perpetual treaty with the United States guaranteeing freedom of trade to the United States and exemption from all import tariff duties upon any goods, merchandise, or trade from the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg at this time to ask that the second amendment I tendered shall be read, as I desire to discuss them both, in order that I may not occupy the floor on two consecutive occasions for one single event. The other amendment tendered may be read now, and we may dispose of them both, as one is inconsistent with the other if either is adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the second amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That there shall be vested in the President and by this act he is authorized to enter into any convention or agreement with the administration in power in the government of the Philippines for payment to the United States of such sum of money, and by such method of installment as may return to the United States the sums of money heretofore paid for and for the purposes and government of the Philippine Islands, or such part of said sum expended by the Government of the United States, as to the President of the United States shall, under all the circumstances, appear equitable.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to indulge me for a few moments while I explain what was the purpose of these amendments as I apprehend them.

It has been stated by Senators participating in this debate, beginning with the statement of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], that the expenditures put out upon the Philippine Islands would reach, possibly, $800,000,000. Prior to this session, in the sessions of the past, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, stated the figure of $600,000,000. Yesterday the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] called attention to the figure of $400,000,000. It is evident that an amount between the figure of $800,000,000 and that of $400,000,000 has been expended.

Mr. President, we are about to give up these islands in pursuance of our promise and our duty; but I do not feel, sir, that our altruism should go so far as to permit, through inadvertence or design, a punishment of the United States for its kindnesses when it could be rewarded consistently with justice to the islands and with right to the United States.

I invite the attention of Senators, particularly the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and such other Senators as participated in the matter of the convention between this country and Spain when we came to the terms of peace, to the fact that we had an understanding with Cuba, which we all believed would be carried out, that some preferential privileges would be given the United States by Cuba. Since Cuba received its independence, true to its native blood and its natural affection and its previous affiliations with its mother country, the United States has been compelled to witness a trade with Spain by Cuba exceeding that given to the United States, goods purchased from Spain exceeding those purchased from the United States, notwithstanding the contiguity of this country to Cuba, the saving in freights, and such other considerations as readily arise in the mind.

I beg to suggest that we be not rewarded with such inconsideration by the Philippine Islands; and I tender one of two suggestions: That the President shall have, as a condition precedent to announcing the sovereignty of the islands under the amendment designated as the Clarke amendment, the right to exact a treaty made with the United States by the government then in charge of the Philippine Islands that shall give to the United States the right to trade with the Philippine Islands to this extent—that no tariff duties shall be levied upon any imports or shipments from the United States. In this manner, by exempting us from these customs duties, we will to some small extent recover some of the vast millions we have expended, out of a noble spirit, in behalf of these islands. We will have encouraged the trade and met the objection urged by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], who, in as full a manner as it could be presented from that point of view, disclosed the benefits of the trade feature.

Mr. President, I desire to avoid the penalty that was visited upon us by Cuba. I desire to assure to the United States the rights that I feel she has at this time the privilege of exacting.

Having stated my purpose with regard to the first amendment, I beg now to invite the attention of the Senate to the second.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator passes to the second amendment, may I ask him a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely; I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand from the Senator that he proposes to have an agreement made with the Philippine Islands by which no duties of any kind shall be exacted upon goods sent from the United States into the Philippines, but that the United States shall be left free to impose such duties as it chooses upon goods imported from the Philippine Islands into the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator that such was in my mind. I realize that reciprocity in these matters is just. Therefore it will be observed that the amendment proposed by me leaves it open to the President of the United States to give such terms as in his judgment may be appropriate. I decline to make an amendment of penalty, such as their failure to enter into this treaty being sufficient to avoid the announcement of the proclamation. The amendment is left so that such provision as suggested by the Senator, if it is then deemed wise by our Government to concede, may be given without any inconsistency with the language of the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now let me ask the Senator a further question: Do I understand him to say that we had some such arrangement as that with Cuba?

Mr. LEWIS. We had no treaty of the kind suggested by the amendment. We had a trade arrangement with Cuba by which we were to get certain preferential privileges; and these, I think, were extended for a certain length of time. Since then, by virtue of the duties they levy upon us and the different burdens upon us, we have been unable to compete even with Spain.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But that is reciprocal, is it not?

Mr. LEWIS. In sugar only.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, but no matter. We agree to admit to this country, under a differential duty, Cuban sugar, which is their chief product, and tobacco, under an arrangement by which we reduce our tariff duties 20 per cent, and in consideration of that the Cuban Government agrees to admit our products with a like reduction from the tariff duties. That is a reciprocal arrangement; but, as I understand the Senator, he proposes in this case to put the entire burden upon the Philippine Islands, and that the United States shall not reciprocate in any particular whatever.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, with the sagacity and ability that characterize all his efforts, may tender an amendment to meet the point to which he alludes. For myself, I am very frank to state that I felt that this was due us in return for the vast expenditures we have contributed to the Philippine Islands, and it is no injustice to the Philippine Islands to ask that they grant it now in consideration of the many advantages heretofore obtained from us. But if it shall seem wise to the President, when the time comes to carry out such a plan, to tender that reciprocity, the amendment is in no-wise inconsistent with it.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts, who first rose.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator passes to his second amendment, I desire to refer to the discussion which he has just been offering, relating to the trade of a dependency. Undoubtedly it is true that the trade of Cuba, which was established with Spain, naturally continued in the same channel, where it had been established and where the goods were known. Is not that probably the reason why Spain acquired or retained so much of the trade with Cuba, rather than the fact that Spain was formerly the mother country of that island?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it may be that the previous associations which wedded Cuba to Spain have had material influence in producing the result to which I allude. I am seeking to avoid some of that, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts, by suggesting a method that makes the price list less than that of Spain in the Philippine Islands as an inducement to trade with the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President.——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I rise not in any spirit of criticism, but for an inquiry, as I have not kept much trace of the tariff legislation of Cuba since the so-called Cuban reciprocity treaty. I will ask the Senator if Cuba has a tariff rate preferential to Spain and discriminating against us, having in mind that treaty?

Mr. LEWIS. I am compelled to inform the Senator I have no knowledge on that subject. I am giving my conclusions drawn from the figures of imports, and I have no knowledge whether any preceding preferential treaty with Spain exists or not.

Now, Mr. President, not desiring to occupy the floor and to delay a vote, I have tendered my reason for the first amendment. If it shall be adopted it will be unfair that the second amendment shall be. If the first shall not be adopted, then I tender the second, which is that if we are to have duties laid against us and have the discriminating relation by which our trade must compete with the trade of the world in the Philippine Islands, measured by the wages paid and the other conditions which we know surround the trade of Europe as it can be made with the Philippine Islands, then, I submit, we ought to be permitted some form of compensation from the new government returning to us some of the moneys which we have advanced in behalf of the Philippines. The amount and the method of payment I leave to the President to be negotiated at the time of the announcement of the proclamation. Such is the subject and spirit of the second amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Illinois leaves the determination of the amount to the judgment of the President, and it might be one dollar or eight hundred million dollars, according to his statement as to the amount of expenditures. Would the Senator feel free to express to the Senate his view as to what would be equitable under all the circumstances?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] this morning in his observations brought attention to one of the confusing elements, and that is the contradiction in the amount of money we have expended on the islands as distinguished from the amount we have expended for our military support in suppressing insurrections in the islands. I would leave to the President of the United States to charge against the islands only such sum as in equity we would seem to have contributed to the islands, but not charge them the full sum we expended, which might also include what we expended in suppressing insurrection. Such was my object in leaving that in the manner suggested by the amendment. I could not state any exact figure, answering more substantially, for that would have to be evolved from the books of the insular commission, which are not at my service. I have answered the Senator to the best of my ability.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator go back to the first proposed amendment. I wish to inquire of him in reference thereto, whether he has any information as to the proportionate amount of the present revenues of the Philippine Islands that are derived from duties on imports.

Mr. LEWIS. Of all imports over the world?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I am not able to give the Senator the reply. I must inform the Senator that in my personal examination of the subject on a visit to the Philippine Islands I watched it, such as a "looker-on in Vienna" might, and I observed that the form of customs levied there is levied by the United States and not by the Philippines, as probably the Senator is aware, and reported to the United States as coming to the Philippine Islands from different countries. I have no memory at this time as to what they are in toto and can not reply to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I have the impression that they import now from our country the greatest amount of goods coming into the islands.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the Senator is fairly accurate.

Mr. WALSH. So that one-half of the revenue derived by the country through customs will come from imports from the United States. That, I imagine, would be a very considerable source of revenue. The islands would be impoverished, would they not, by the operation of this amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. I invite the Senator's attention to that which I believe to be the existing fact, that the reason why so large a quantity comes from the United States is that the United States is buying from itself. United States officials are in power there; United States families live there; the United States has certain industries established there. But I apprehend when the islands have gone from our sovereignty and come in the hands of those who, for many reasons, feel very kindly toward us, but from racial distinction have lines of industry by virtue of previous relations, the trade will go elsewhere, because there will be none of the inducements to have the trade which previously existed. Such is my view.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I am afraid of. Would not the future operation of this amendment be to induce the Filipinos to establish trade relations with some other country so that they might derive revenues for the sustenance of their Government?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator that is a most pertinent inquiry, and it would arise naturally, if not for this conclusion—that in the absence of duties charged against us we would have to undersell some competitors and make it an inducement to the Filipinos to purchase from the United States.

I feel I have manifested to the Senate the object of my amendments, and further amplification therefore would be useless.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, we went into the Philippine Islands and took possession of the country of the Filipinos against their will. We whipped them in order to take possession, in order that they might remain quiet in our possession, and now we propose to penalize them for that much of their history.

Mr. President, this penalization is in two forms as presented by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. In the first place, we deprive them, if his amendment is adopted, of a prime and necessary source of revenue. We deny them the right to levy an import duty, even for revenue purposes, upon products coming to them from the United States. If we do that, we virtually deprive them of all revenue from import duties, because they can not get along in the family of nations except upon the theory that they treat all nations equally. There will have to be with them, as with all other people, a favored-nation clause. If they permit the products of the United States perpetually to reach their shores without levying any revenue upon it, they are either not an independent nation, capable of making equal treaties with all the world, or, if they are, they consent to the surrender of all revenue duties.

The second amendment would penalize them by subjecting them to a tribute or an indemnity for what? Unless it is because that, without their invitation or their consent, we conquered and whipped them, I do not know what the indemnity or tribute would be for.

It is true that we spent a great deal of money there. It is true that very much of that money went to their benefit as well as to our own. It is true that we have educated a great many of them, built a great many roads—dirt roads and railroads—and that the United States has partially paid for a great many of these benefits to the Philippine people; but in the meantime we were enjoying sovereignty there, and to levy a tribute upon a people because you—of your own will and purpose, not theirs—chose to assert and exercise sovereignty is rather an unprecedented thing.

But my main objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois goes beyond all that. We have witnessed this morning a queer run from ultra altruism to this proposition. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] a few moments ago wanted us to give them $20,000,000 for educational purposes, when heaven knows $20,000,000 expended for education in certain parts of the United States would do not only us but the world very much more good. Now we go to the other extreme.

But even all that does not constitute my main objection. I do not want to say a thing about parties in connection with this, and yet to a certain extent I must. There are a lot of us, mainly Democrats, who have been fighting for 20 years nearly to get a majority in both Houses of the National Legislature, so that we might undo what we regarded the wrong that was perpetrated by this Government when it took possession and kept possession of the Philippine Islands, a wrong not only to the inhabitants of the archipelago but a wrong to our own institutions, our own traditions, and our own ideals.

When after 20 years we have succeeded in getting a majority in both Houses so that we may turn those people loose, so that we may let them go, to use the Biblical language which was used regarding the children of Israel under Pharaoh, there comes a proposition that we shall let them go only upon the condition precedent that there shall have been a treaty executed between them and us guaranteeing freedom of trade, and so forth and so on, or, under the second amendment, a further guaranteeing payment beyond what we regard as a fair amount of money as indemnity, if you choose to so call it; or as tribute, if you choose to call it that.

After 20 years we have gotten to a point where a majority can let them loose, can let them go; and now we are faced with a proposition to put it in the power of one-third of the United States Senate to refuse to let them go. After 20 years of work, just as we approach the promised land and look down over it and see what we have been yearning for, we will be placed in a position where one-third of the Senate can block our hope, block our further travail, and totally destroy our project of granting these people their independence.

Ah, some one says that the Senate of the United States would not act in bad faith in refusing to vote for the treaty. My reply is that it would not be in bad faith, because I would not vote for a treaty, speaking as one, which put a tribute upon those people equal to one-half even of the amount of money that the United States Government has spent in the Philippine Islands, neither would I vote for a treaty which would deprive them of the right of sovereignty to collect the revenues upon import duties.

Now, treaties can be entered into between them and us if we are friendly in spirit with one another after we part company, under which by reciprocal arrangement we may make terms that will adapt themselves to the best interests of the commerce of both countries. But that ought not to be mixed up with this prime question of giving those people independence. If you are going to give them independence, give them independence with sovereignty attached to it, not independence with a string that would bring about every year the possibility of friction; that would lead to renewed war with those people and possibly a renewed conquest.

For us at the last moment, when we have what we sought within our grasp, to consent to leave the consummation of our hopes to one-third of the Senate instead of to a majority of both Houses, to leave ourselves where we must have two-thirds of this body, seems to me to be suicidal from the standpoint of the policy which we advocate. It would not be in bad faith for a single Senator on the other side or this who is conscientiously opposed to Philippine independence to vote because of that against a treaty which would put that independence beyond question. If I were conscientiously opposed to the independence of the Philippine Archipelago, if I were conscientiously in favor of the proposition that our duty to God and man called upon us to remain there, then I would not vote for a treaty which had been made a condition precedent to their independence and thereby accomplish a thing which I believed to be radically and fundamentally wrong. I would use every legitimate instrumentality to defeat their independence, if I honestly thought that their independence was bad for them and bad for us, as some Senators, equal in honesty and sincerity, do sincerely believe. So I hope this amendment will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the second amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call up the amendment which I offered on page 30.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, line 16, before the word "treaty," insert the word "or"; in the same line strike out the words "title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved" and insert "of the United States is involved, or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of or commission held or authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or immunity especially set up or claimed by either party under such Constitution, treaty, statute, commission, or authority."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have already discussed this amendment, and I do not care to discuss it further. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he has considered it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that such examination as I have given it has indicated that it is a perfectly proper amendment. I do not know that it is necessary. My impression is that the language in the bill, which is the language in the organic act, has been operating successfully, and, possibly, it has been construed, but I can see no reason for opposing the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator if the amendment is designed to give an appeal where the court has denied a right claimed under the Constitution or laws of the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My amendment deals with a case where the title, or right, or privilege, or immunity is claimed under the United States or under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. When it was up before I suggested that we permit an appeal, whether the right was denied or granted. We find in this country a great deal of embarrassment growing out of our present law, which only allows an appeal where rights are denied. There is a tendency to grant the right rather than to face an appeal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think there has been any complaint about that with reference to this phase of it. The Senator states that where a statute has been held to be constitutional complaint has been made that no appeal is allowed in that case.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language which is now in the organic act will admit of an appeal in that case, because it is not worded the same as the section with reference to an appeal from the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not hear the amendment as read, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language, with my amendment, will be:

That the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, reverse, modify, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in all actions, cases, causes, and proceedings now pending therein or hereafter determined thereby in which the Constitution or any statute or treaty of the United States is involved.

Down to that point it will cover the matter which the Senator has in mind. That will allow an appeal, whichever way the decision is. It is only necessary that the Constitution shall be involved, it makes no difference how the question shall be decided. Now, when we come to the second branch of it, "or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed," then the decision must be against the right, title, or immunity in order to allow the appeal. I think that should be so.

Mr. CLAPP. I think not, Mr. President. I know a great deal of complaint has been made for several years and very able articles have appeared on that subject from prominent lawyers throughout the country. I have had letters from them complaining that there is a tendency under such a provision to grant the right, in other words, to hold the act unconstitutional, thus defeating an opportunity to secure an adjudication in the Supreme Court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the Senator about that, but that proposition is not involved in this amendment. Under this section, as it will be when amended, an appeal will be allowed where the constitutionality is involved, no matter what the decision may be.

Mr. CLAPP. There was such confusion I did not hear the Senator's amendment read, but as I read it now from the print I see it is as the Senator states.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he has any objection to the change in wording that I suggested on page 5. It does not alter the bill, but I think makes the wording better.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the change suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 9, after the word "denomination," insert the words "sectarian institution," and in line 12, after the word "dignitary," strike out the words "or sectarian institution."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if this is the proper time to do so, I desire to reserve the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and all proposed or offered amendments thereto for a separate vote when the bill goes into the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has made certain amendments to the bill. The Senator from Nebraska reserves what is known as the Clarke amendment for a separate vote. The question is on concurring in the other amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For that I offer the following substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a substitute the following:

That not less than two years nor more than four years from the meeting of the legislature provided for in this act the President shall withdraw the sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands, except such necessary portions thereof as he may select for naval bases or coaling stations. He shall, however, before completing the final steps of this withdrawal, require of the Filipinos the establishment of a stable government, republican in form, and based upon the consent of the people duly ascertained at an election called by act of the legislature, approved by the President. At this election shall be submitted for approval the form of constitution recommended by the legislature, as well as the names of all candidates for elective office in the first provisional government. Said constitution shall provide that the new Philippine Republic shall fulfill the obligations of the United States concerning the Philippine Islands incurred by the treaty of Paris or arising out of the occupation of the islands, including the personal and property rights of individuals and corporations of the United States and other countries and the safeguarding of such Philippine Government loans and other obligations as have heretofore been authorized by act of Congress. Said constitution shall also provide that in all trade relations the United States shall have the benefit of the most-favored-nation clause. If the constitution is approved at said election and the provisional government created, the President shall then, by proclamation, recognize the independence of the Philippine Republic and turn over to the Philippine Government the control and sovereignty of the islands, except such naval bases and coaling stations as are above provided for. If, however, the President shall find at any time within the period of limitation provided above that the condition of the external or internal affairs of the islands or the international relations of the United States require it, or if a constitution as above provided be not adopted, he may, by proclamation, extend for the period of one year beyond the four years above provided the time for taking action under this act and thus afford to Congress an opportunity, in its discretion, to consider further the Philippine question, but any such extension of time by the President shall not otherwise suspend or nullify the operative force of this act unless Congress shall hereafter so direct.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is substantially the amendment which was disposed of the other day, and I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust the Senator from Arkansas will withhold that motion for two reasons: First, I want to secure unanimous consent to vote upon this bill and all amendments before 5 o'clock to-morrow; second, I should like——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think we can vote on the bill before 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the substitute which I have offered printed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. As I understand, it is the same thing that was voted down the other day, with the substitution of the word "constitution" for the word "treaty."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken in that. I have changed the limitation from four years and six years down to two years and four years to conform with his own amendment, and I have inserted a clause doing away with the treaty provision that seemed to involve delay and opposition, particularly from the Senator from Colorado, and inserting substantially the same provision that Congress put in the legislation which recognized the independence of Cuba, a provision requiring that the constitution of the Philippine people shall incorporate provisions for the guarantee of certain rights and the observance of the obligations of the United States in the islands. I think that is a substantial difference from the substitute of yesterday, and I think the Senate is entitled to an opportunity to see the substitute in printed form. I trust the Senator will not insist on the gag suggestion that he makes and will permit me to ask unanimous consent for a vote before 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, if it had not been for the last remark of the Senator about attempting to gag anybody I believe I could not have resisted any request that he might make. I did not suppose, in making a motion—a perfectly parliamentary motion—to dispose of a matter that had been debated and defeated by a vote of more than two to one that I was attempting to gag anybody. It is simply a proposition now to consume another day, to reverse a deliberate judgment of the Senate. If it were a matter that was new, if it were a matter that had not been debated, if it were a matter that we had not all informed ourselves about, I would consent to the request of the Senator; but I believe I shall insist upon the motion to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I withdraw my vote, having a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I do not see him present, and I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr BURLEIGH].

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 43, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas to lay Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment on the table was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow, this bill and all amendments thereto may be put to a final vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Secretary must call the roll before the request is stated, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has hardly been stated as a request for unanimous consent as yet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has objection been made?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Does not the rule provide that the roll must be called before a request for unanimous consent to fix a day for the final vote can be stated?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the final request is submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see how the Chair would know that there had been a request for a unanimous-consent agreement proposed unless it was first submitted. The Chair is now in possession of the amendment that was made to the rule——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I refer to, Mr. President.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the rule provides that immediately upon the request being made the roll shall be called.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I understand.

Mr. JAMES. That is what the rule provides. I looked at it the other day when the same matter was up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rule will be found on page 14 of the Manual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the rule:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present.

That is all that needs to be read at the present time. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the request for unanimous consent must first be stated, and then the Chair must order the roll call.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I understand that there has been objection made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to the request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Chair to read the first line again. My impression was that the rule said that no request for unanimous consent to fix a day for a final vote should be stated——

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; "submitted"——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, "submitted" means——

The VICE PRESIDENT. "To the Senate for agreement thereto."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to submit this thought to the Chair, for this ruling might have a future effect that would be more important than it is at present. I can easily imagine a condition where a request for unanimous consent would be submitted to fix a date to vote on a bill and amendments thereto, and there might not be more than a very small number of Senators present. If there were, for example, a dozen present, and no objection should be made, then, under the ruling of the Chair, the only thing to be done would be to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri totally misapprehends the ruling of the Chair. The Chair has made no such ruling. The Chair has ruled that the Chair can not have the roll called to determine the question of a quorum until the Chair knows that some Senator wants to submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement; and the Chair does not believe that that can be accomplished by some Senator stepping up and stating to the Chair that he would like to submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, but that he shall rise in the Senate and say that he wants to submit such a proposed agreement; whereupon it is the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called to disclose the presence of a quorum.

Mr. STONE. I did misunderstand the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Entirely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it seems to me that this discussion is all unnecessary, and that a roll call is unnecessary to disclose the presence of a quorum, when the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has already objected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not understand how any Senator can object to the granting of a request for unanimous consent before the request has been submitted to the Senate.

If I understand this matter correctly, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] did make a request for unanimous consent, whereupon I made the point of order that the roll must be called before it could be submitted. If I may be permitted a few words—I have no personal interest whatever except to see the rule observed—the rule provides in paragraph 3, rule 12, page 14, as follows:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the Presiding Officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present.

The Senator from Nebraska made a request for unanimous consent. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] stated that he objected; but I do not think that the request has been submitted to the Senate, and I think the roll must be called before it is submitted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the rule is carefully drawn with a view of giving a Senator an opportunity to inquire the attitude of the Senate before a formal submission is made. It was prepared with that in view. It was drawn by my former colleague, and after conference it was so worded that before formally submitting a request for a vote on a specific date a desire to submit the question might be stated so as to ascertain the attitude of the Senate. If some Senator stated on the informal inquiry that he would object, then the Senator desiring to submit the formal request would not make it because it would apparently be useless. That has been the mode of procedure with reference to this rule ever since it has been adopted, just as the Chair and as the Senator from Nebraska have proceeded to-day.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 4, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, whom we worship as the Father of all souls, how long, oh, how long wilt Thou suffer Thy children to mutilate, murder, and waste each other under the pretext of war to preserve their national liberty and rights! Interpose, oh, we beseech Thee, Thy holy influence to quicken the conscience of the men who are behind the awful holocaust that they may realize the terrible responsibility resting upon them, that their differences may be justly and amicably adjusted by the crucial test of reason, justice, and mercy, that all the world may once more enjoy home, love, and freedom in the fruitful pursuits of peace, and all glory and honor and praise shall be Thine through Him who gave us the new and holy commandment, "That ye love one another as I have loved you." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPEECHES BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as a House document the speeches which have been made by the President of the United States on his trip through the West.

The SPEAKER. Why not wait until the President gets back and include all of them?

Mr. FOSTER. He will have made his last speech last night or this morning, and I will ask to include that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print as a House document the speeches made by the President on his trip through the West and those that may be made by him.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that may be done.

Mr. MANN. If the Democratic Members will read them, I am in favor of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they will be read generally by the people throughout the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object—of course I have no objection to the publication of the speeches by the President, but it is taking a great deal of liberty to ask to print not only speeches made but those that may hereafter be made.

Mr. FOSTER. There have been a good many speeches printed in the RECORD by the extension of remarks.

Mr. BARNHART. I think it would be proper to wait until the others have been made, and then ask permission to print them as a House document.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course it might be done by asking to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no desire to object; but it does not seem proper to give consent that speeches made in the future shall be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. The President made his last speech last night or this morning.

Mr. BARNHART. The Speaker put the request for speeches to be made.

Mr. CANNON. That he may make on this trip.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they have all been made now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman's request to be that the speeches the President has made up to this time on the western trip be published as a House document?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I understand he made the last speech this morning at St. Louis.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the request to include speeches that he might make hereafter.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is facetious, he can object if he wants to.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not object; I think the speeches ought to be printed, but it seems to me we ought to have them printed immediately, the speeches that have been made, and not wait for future speeches.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not to wait for them.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection; I think they will make an excellent document on the other side of the question.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the gentleman's private opinion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 4954. An act directing the Secretary of War to reconvey a parcel of land to the Anshe Chesed Congregation, Vicksburg, Miss.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolutions:

House concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the reports of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, in two volumes, for the period from March 12, 1914, to December 31, 1915, inclusive, together with accompanying maps, charts, and profiles, be printed as a House document and that 6,000 additional copies be printed, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,500 copies for the use of the commission.

House concurrent resolution 13.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 100,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse, the same to be first revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, 70,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 30,000 for use of the Senate.

House concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 100,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle, the same to be first revised and brought to date, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, 70,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 30,000 copies for use of the Senate.

AMENDING HOUSE RULE.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 122.

Resolved, That the standing rules of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, amended in the following manner, to wit:

In Rule X insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"54b. On flood control, to consist of 15 members."

In Rule XI insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"54b. To flood control, other than appropriations therefor, to the committee on flood control."

Mr. SPARKMAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I rise to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if there will be any discussion on this resolution?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; there is to be discussion. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Kansas as to the matter of time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What suggestion has the gentleman from Tennessee to make?

Mr. GARRETT. We are willing to go ahead pretty rapidly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have very little time demanded on the rule itself. I suggested to some gentlemen on the other side of the House last night that I would probably have some time that I could yield them; they had asked for time in which to discuss flood conditions in their districts, and it was stated that such discussion could be had under this rule.

Mr. GARRETT. That was the statement made publicly yesterday.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a parliamentary question. I had leave of absence for two years and I do not know what was done in that time. I recall that when I had the honor to preside on this Calendar Wednesday that it was so holy——

A MEMBER. This is Thursday.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have been watching other matters and I have dropped a stitch. I suppose, without further remark, I ought to say that my losing track of the day is due to the sorrows of a poor old wicked devil. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Remembering the ruling which the gentleman from Illinois made, we carefully refrained from calling this resolution up on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; Calendar Wednesday was so holy that nothing could interfere with it but Calendar Wednesday business. It is still holy, is it?

Mr. GARRETT. So far. Now, the gentleman from Kansas and myself are both for this rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; there will be no discussion on the rule itself, I think, for I do not know of any opposition to the rule.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] is opposed to the rule.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say frankly that I am not entirely opposed to it. I have some views that I would like to express.

Mr. GARRETT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would say 15 minutes would answer my purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. It provides that the standing rules of the House be amended so as to create a new standing committee and to define the jurisdiction of that committee. The committee to be created is to be entitled the committee on flood control, and in that part of the resolution which defines its jurisdiction it is recited that all matters referring to flood control shall be referred to this committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Let me finish the preliminary statement. The Committee on Rules has recognized the tremendous importance of this subject matter, and that committee has felt that there should be created a standing committee of the House which could give scrutiny and attention to that question, that committee having jurisdiction of that subject matter only and, therefore, has reported unanimously this resolution with the recommendation that it pass. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman, in view of the language of the latter part of the resolution, "54b. To flood control, other than appropriations therefor, to the Committee on Flood Control," whether it would not be well to amend the resolution, in line 8, by saying "To flood control and the drainage of swamp and overflowed lands," because "flood control" may not necessarily include a very important element, in my opinion, and that is the drainage of overflowed land.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, that would be broadening the idea which the Committee on Rules had in mind when it reported this resolution. As a matter of fact, I should assume that bills touching that question would be referred to this committee, whether it is provided in the rule or not.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought the gentleman was going to reply that he thought the words "flood control" broad enough; but if he replies that my suggestion would broaden the meaning of the words as the committee used them, then I think an amendment is certainly necessary, because it seems to me that the drainage of overflowed lands being so nearly related to flood control and yet being not necessarily directly included in it, ought to be included within the functions of this committee. There is no other committee to which that matter could appropriately go. It could not appropriately go to the Agricultural Committee and certainly not to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may have been unhappy in my expression in reply to the gentleman's first inquiry, but in the latter part of my inquiry I think I made it clear. I think certainly that all bills of the character mentioned by the gentleman would be referred to this committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman would have no objection to such an amendment? I should like very much to urge the amendment. I do not think there ought to be any substantial objection to it.

Mr. GARRETT. I would prefer not to include those words. I think it would not be proper to include them at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to the phraseology, more from a grammatical standpoint than anything else. I have considered the rules with this new rule inserted, and find that the reading will be rather awkward. I assume the gentleman intends, so far as the last provision is concerned, to insert it immediately following "54a"; 54a begins as the gentleman will note "To matters relating to the construction or maintenance of roads other than appropriations therefor, to the Committee on Roads"; 54b would come right after that and it would say, "To flood control, other than appropriations therefor; to the Committee on Flood Control.' I would suggest that in order to make it in harmony with the previous section that after the word "to" there be inserted "matters relating to."

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will turn back of 54a and read the other provisions, he will find this language to which he refers is in harmony with all of the other provisions, and that 54a itself is the grammatical exception to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to the wording in section 53, "All proposed legislation concerning the disposition of useless papers, to the joint committee, and so forth." Now, it is sought to make a subdivision of section 54. Section 54 is as follows:

All proposed legislation concerning the census and the apportionment of representatives; to the Committee on the Census.

The House at the last Congress incorporated a new provision, section 54a, in which it was provided that matters relating to the construction or maintenance of roads should be referred to the Committee on Roads.

If the gentleman is going to have phraseology in consonance with that subsection of which this is a part the language should be similar. To throw into this section of the rule following 54a such language, "54b. To flood control, other than the appropriations therefor, to the committee on flood control," is rather awkward in the extreme. The gentleman should certainly frame it in some language harmonious with the prefatory part of section 54a. I will ask the gentleman whether the committee considered that, because I think it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, that was considered, I will say to the gentleman. If the gentleman will turn to page 287 of the book I have in hand now—the pages may be different—at the beginning of Rule XI it provides:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committee named by the preceding rule as follows, namely: Subjects relating, first, to the election of Members—

And so on. And in subsection 39 it runs in exactly that language. The proposition which the gentleman suggests was considered and it was thought that we had adopted the simplest and plainest language that could be adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only criticism that can be lodged against that position is that in the sections following section 37 there is language that does not conform. If that were the rule throughout, the position of the gentleman might be well taken, but in section 54 and section 53 there is adopted different language. Those sections begin with the phrase, "All proposed legislation concerning." Now, section 54a, which the gentleman reported, adopts new language, "To matters relating to the construction and maintenance of roads." To be in harmony with that I insist the gentleman should follow that language, otherwise there is nothing to connect it except that at the very beginning. Here we have interposed a section which has been disjointed by the intervening language that varies with the original phraseology.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, with all possible deference to my friend, who I know studies these matters very carefully, I do not think there will be any trouble about the meaning of this rule if it be adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. There would be no question about the meaning, but it will be very awkward.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I notice the rule provides for a committee on flood control. I have listened to the gentleman's explanation of the rule, but I do not think he went sufficiently into detail to give the House full information as to what he thinks constitutes flood control. I will illustrate the question by stating what I have in mind: For instance, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at present has charge of the Mississippi River for all the purposes of navigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I assume the discussion now going on on the other side of the aisle is of importance to the House and I should like to hear it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, within certain limitations the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House has had charge of the improvement of the lower Mississippi River, appropriating large sums of money each year, and the language appropriating these amounts is always so guarded as to confine the improvement of the river to the building of levees, to protect against floods, of course, and for the purposes of navigation. What I want to ask is, What effect would this rule, if adopted, or this amendment to the rules and the appointment of this committee under it, have on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors over that class of work?

Mr. GARRETT. I should say, Mr. Speaker, that bills relating to flood control would be referred to this new committee if the rule be adopted. I do not think that those bills which refer to the question of the navigation of the Mississippi would be referred to this new committee, but that they would be referred, as they have always been since the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was created, to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then the gentleman is of the opinion that if we make an appropriation, as we are likely to do, for the improvement of the Mississippi River below Cairo, using the same language we have been using heretofore, providing that the amount shall be expended in the building of levees and the revetment of banks, and so forth, so far as, in the opinion of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers, may be necessary for the purposes of navigation, it would not be subject to a point of order if this committee be created?

Mr. GARRETT. I think not; that is my personal opinion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has stated what the rule proposed to do. Now, will the gentleman state why it is proposed to do that? What is the reason for taking part of the jurisdiction away from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and creating a special committee?

Mr. GARRETT. Because of the realization of the fact on the part of the Committee on Rules that there are aspects of the question of flood control which are not related to either navigation or commerce.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to get at the idea of the gentleman as to the duties of this committee. The same question may have been asked by some of those other gentlemen over there, but I have not been able to get any information. Does this relate to the prevention of floods and matters pertaining to the avoiding of floods or does it pertain to matters of relief in emergencies such as exist at the present time in some parts of the Mississippi Valley, or both?

Mr. GARRETT. Of course it would pertain to both, and, having no appropriating power, I should say this committee could not do much on the question of immediate relief.

Mr. SHERLEY. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. To what committee would the power to appropriate on matters authorized by this committee go?

Mr. GARRETT. To the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. On what theory is that advanced? The present Committee on Rivers and Harbors has appropriating power over this subject matter. Now, you do not take that away by any express statement.

Mr. GARRETT. What I mean is that if this committee which is thus created should bring in a bill and that bill should be enacted into law providing for a continuing contract, that would necessarily, under the rules of the House as they now stand, go to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am just trying to get the facts that are involved in this proposition before the House. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, but I think that statement ought to have been made. Now, going back to my previous inquiry, is it not true that every committee of the House, dealing with any particular subject matter, has to necessarily deal with a lot of things that are collateral to it, and that the reason advanced would apply to practically every big committee's jurisdiction?

Mr. GARRETT. That is an abstract principle.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if the Irrigation Committee could not take care of nearly all the items that are presented, for the reason that these dams and ditches on the heads of all these streams could hold the water and the ditches in the Irrigation Service could keep the water cut off the swamps on the lower part of the river?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the subjects are related at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me to make a statement there, I have in mind one great project in the Indian Service, known as the Yakima irrigation scheme, under the supervision both of the United States Government and the Indian Service—the reclamation laws of the United States. The two matters can not be separated. You have two committees at work on the same reservation, one putting water on the upper part of the reservation, flooding the lower part of the reservation, and one now making appropriation to take the water away from the lower part of the reservation.

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I presume it will be impossible to have a committee whose jurisdiction with some other committee of the House might not at some time seem to cross. But I do not think that the Committee on Irrigation could possibly deal with the questions that are presented and that will be referred to the committee on flood control, if it be created.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am aware that there are some very large rivers that would not come under this rule.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Just a moment. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker? I want to treat these gentlemen fairly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask just one question.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. The Government has done considerable work in view of preventing floods. What committee had jurisdiction over that work? Was it the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. GARRETT. To what work does the gentleman refer?

Mr. STERLING. I think they have appropriated money for building levees, have they not?

Mr. GARRETT. The levees to which the gentleman refers have always been built on the theory that they were in the interest of navigation, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had jurisdiction of that—that is, if the gentleman refers to the Mississippi River levees.

Mr. STERLING. I do refer to that, and many others that have been built.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not overlook the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River that has been in existence for many years without a meeting.

Mr. GARRETT. The Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River never had jurisdiction while I was a member of it. I cut my eyeteeth in that committee, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LONGWORTH and Mr. STERLING rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. This rule would take away from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the jurisdiction it has exercised in the past on the question of levees?

Mr. GARRETT. It would not take away jurisdiction of any question affecting navigation or commerce.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was about the question I was going to ask the gentleman. I could not hear the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; but what I wanted to know was precisely how much jurisdiction this would actually take away from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GARRETT. I can only repeat the answer which I made to the gentleman from Illinois, that it will not, in my opinion, take away the jurisdiction of any question affecting directly navigation or commerce.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman able to state whether the adoption of this rule will facilitate or retard expenditures from the Public Treasury?

Mr. GARRETT. I did not get the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked, will it facilitate or retard the getting of appropriations? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. I can not tell about that until the bills come in. The rule itself carries no appropriation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask whether I am correct in assuming that this resolution was introduced on the day before yesterday and that that was the first knowledge the House had of the proposition to create this committee? Is that correct?

Mr. GARRETT. It was introduced day before yesterday, as I recall it.

Mr. TREADWAY. And I understand the Committee on Rules reports it back now and expects that the House will at once act pro or con on the subject?

Mr. GARRETT. No; the Committee on Rules reported it back yesterday. It is now before the House for consideration, and it is expected that the House will act pro or con to-day.

Mr. TREADWAY. At once?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, since it is a new subject, sprung so quickly, without opportunity for consideration either on the part of the committees that will be affected by it or of the House as a whole, that in deference to the Members considering the subject it might not take a later place on the calendar and be brought up at a future day? Or is it introduced with the idea that it is so important that it must be acted upon immediately?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee is before the House. I do not know whether I can answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts or not. It has certainly been a much-agitated question for a long while. The Committee on Rules has considered it.

Now I desire to yield some time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish the gentleman would yield and take care of some gentlemen on that side, and then I will take the floor in my own right and yield to some gentlemen here.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], reserving, of course, my right to resume the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that, will he yield to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GARRETT. I had yielded. If the gentleman will pardon me, there are a number of gentlemen wanting time now, since this matter has risen. I wonder if we can not agree upon some time for debate now. I shall be very glad, indeed, to yield if I can, if there is any desire for time. If not, of course, I shall have to retain the floor, and move the previous question at the end of the hour.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] say?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the demand for time is growing on this side. I promised 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR], and I think we had better run on for a limited time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this resolution shall conclude in 1 hour and 30 minutes; 30 minutes of that time to be controlled by myself, 30 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], and that at the end of that time the previous question may be considered as ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for more than 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest an hour on a side.

Mr. GARRETT. I am endeavoring, Mr. Speaker, to arrange the time so that those who, as I understand, are opposed to the rule may have control of some time. I am perfectly willing to agree to an hour on a side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. In just a moment, and I will yield out of that hour 10 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] if the gentleman from Kansas will yield 10 minutes to him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will yield to some one who is opposed to the rule, if there is anyone on this side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman in favor of the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apparently, then, some one ought to be represented in opposition. I want to secure some information.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is my position. I would like to get 10 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. I desire to get 10 minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no control of it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if we can get order for a few moments——

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Tennessee suggested an hour and thirty minutes, to be divided 30 minutes to myself, 30 minutes to himself, and 30 minutes to the gentleman from Florida. I have suggested an hour, to be divided between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself, and I will give 10 minutes of that time to any gentleman on this side who is opposed to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman's suggestion one hour from the present time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; one hour each.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have an hour, or 45 minutes, as he desires——

Mr. GARRETT. That will be sufficient——

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] 45 minutes, and the gentleman from Florida 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee shall have 45 minutes at his disposal, and the gentleman from Kansas 45 minutes at his disposal, and the gentleman from Florida 45 minutes at his disposal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I merely want to ask whether I can have 10 minutes from any one of these three gentlemen?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if we can get order for a moment, I will undertake to ascertain how many gentlemen here desire time.

Mr. SMALL. I desire some time.

Mr. MANN. The whole House desires time.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not propose to lose control of the floor. If we can not reach an agreement, of course, I shall have to move the previous question. If we can just have a moment to see how much time is desired, I will undertake to submit a proposition. In the meantime will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] find out how much time is desired on that side?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request to make it an hour to each one of three gentlemen, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] renews his request for unanimous consent——

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think we will come to an agreement here in a moment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution may be continued for 2 hours and 30 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], 1 hour to be controlled by myself, and half an hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that the debate continue two hours and a half, 1 hour to be controlled by himself, 1 hour by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], 30 minutes by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether I can have 10 minutes out of that allotment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman for or against the resolution?

Mr. SMALL. Against the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. Then the gentleman can get his time from the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my present inclination is to favor this resolution; but at the same time, in view of the circumstances, I think the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, Mr. SPARKMAN, should be given more time, and unless he is given the time he wants, I shall object.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington permit me to say that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] submitted a request to me for 20 minutes, and I voluntarily increased the time to 30 minutes. If the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] desires more time, I shall be very glad to try to arrange it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman from Florida should have sufficient time so that he can yield time to any Members who are opposed to the resolution. I have no doubt that the distinguished gentlemen who have control of the time on either side will deal fairly, but at the same time I think the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] ought to have the time that he wishes. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should think 45 minutes would be sufficient. I find there are more gentlemen who wish to speak on this than I had supposed.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this matter may proceed for 2 hours and 45 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by myself, 1 hour by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]; and that at the end of that time the previous question may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to 2 hours and 45 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by himself, 1 hour by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]; and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] whether in yielding time they are going to divide it impartially, or are they going to give time only to those who favor the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT. I shall yield time indiscriminately to gentlemen, whether they are for or against this resolution.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Washington goes over to the Democratic side of the House to propound that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope these Republicans will compose their differences in private. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I should consider myself remiss in the duty which devolves upon me, representing the constituency I do, which forms a part of the commercial center of the world, located on the largest harbor in the world, dependent as it is, not upon local conditions therein involved, but drawing upon the entire country for the world-renowned supremacy which it enjoys, if I did not avail myself of this opportunity to express the sentiments of the people of my district as favoring the resolution which has been reported. I say that because in every instance when nations, States, or local communities have been stricken by floods or other terrible catastrophes, the people of New York have responded with a commendable promptness to meet the requirements of the situation.

Not so very long ago, at the time of the Galveston flood, trainload after trainload of provisions was gathered at stations established by the sympathetic people of our city and dispatched to the relief of the stricken. That has been repeated with every flood upon the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, and even in every international disaster of note.

I realize that the conditions involved in these flood times along the Mississippi Valley are so important and extensive that it is impossible for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, owing to enormous number of matters requiring attention, to give due and adequate consideration to all the elements involved; and for the same reason I feel that it is incumbent upon this House to recognize those conditions wherever they exist throughout this land, as it expands and advances along the pathway of progress, and it is incumbent upon the House to develop accordingly proper conveniences for the administration of national affairs to meet the needs which arise under those conditions.

I should like in this connection to discuss the necessity for a similar resolution, which I propose to introduce at no distant date, and to have referred to the Committee on Rules, relating to the harbor of New York, where from a commercial standpoint we are just as much affected as are the people of the Mississippi Valley from a humanitarian standpoint. If it were in order for me to do so, I would rise upon the floor of this House and move to discharge the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from the consideration of a bill introduced by me on the 6th of last December, and upon which no action has been taken by the committee. It was intended by this bill to cover the pending and contemplated improvements of New York Harbor. When it is realized that since the administration of Washington down to that of Wilson less than 3 per cent of all the moneys appropriated by Congress for river and harbor improvements has been allotted to the greatest harbor in the world, I hope and believe it will arrest the attention of the Members of the Sixty-fourth Congress in the same serious way as does the resolution which is under consideration at the present time. The improvement of New York Harbor is not a matter local in its nature, but it concerns the people of the entire United States, just as does the Valley of the Mississippi. It belongs to the Nation. It argues its own case, merely requiring my agency as an instrument of presentation; for truth knows on preferences. It seeks no favors and it makes no apologies. It simply demands a hearing.

Approximately one-half of the exports and imports of the United States pass through New York Harbor, and 100,000,000 tons of commerce, if apportioned per capita, making 1 ton for each man, woman, and child in the United States, accommodates every section of this country; and from the merchandise imported through the port of New York more than double the amount of duties is collected and turned into the Federal Treasury than from all other ports of the United States together. And I had almost overlooked the fact and nearly failed to mention that New York State contributed in addition thereto $17,417,537.60, nearly one-half of the individual income tax, and $10,221,206.65, or more than one-fourth, of the corporation income tax collected during the year 1915. Do not these facts appeal to your sense of justice in securing your favorable consideration of that which I am now about to submit? The magnitude of New York City's industrial and commercial possessions, its wealth and population, can be comprehended only by comparison. In every decade since 1840 New York has shown a greater numerical increase in population than any other American city. One-thirteenth of the entire population of the United States now lives in the New York metropolitan district. New York City produces one-tenth of the entire manufactured product of the United States, more than any other State except Pennsylvania.

The value of New York's taxable property exceeds that of Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis combined. New York City banks handle 60 per cent of the clearings of the United States.

New York is the terminus of all but one of the great eastern railroad systems.

Thirty per cent of the entire population of the United States and 42 per cent of all the taxable property lie within 350 miles of New York City. The population in New York City increased since 1900, 47½ per cent. New York manufactures increased between 1900 and 1910, 70 per cent. The foreign commerce of New York increased from 1898 to 1913, 131 per cent. And yet in the improvement of this great harbor the Federal Government has not only failed to keep abreast of the needs of the times but has fallen far in the rear.

I would like to put the New York Harbor situation before you in concrete form:

Improvement.	Adopted.	Appropriated.[1]	Required to complete.	Total.	Commerce.

In addition to the foregoing evidence, that the improvement of New York Harbor is not a "pork-barrel" proposition, let it be noted that the Ambrose Channel was constructed at a saving of about $1,500,000; that the balance to be expended, under the old project, for the improvement of the East River—$2,551,939—can be turned over to, and credited upon, the new project and will suffice to do the work required in the next five years; that the Coney Island Channel improvement was authorized upon an estimate of $168,300, and work to date, costing only $114,300, meets present-day needs and no further appropriations have been asked for.

You are now probably asking yourselves what it is that we seek.

In 1868 the first project was adopted for the improvement of New York Harbor, to wit, East River, a tidal strait, of which the world-renowned Hell Gate is a part, about 16 miles long, extending from the Battery to Throg Neck, separating Long Island from the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx, and connecting up New York Bay with the sheltered waters of Long Island Sound, providing a double entrance and exist to New York Harbor, and establishing a marine trench, which will be more efficient in the defense of that portion of the United States, which nearly all military and naval experts agree would be the first objective point of attack, than a dozen battleships, under present conditions, and at the cost of less than one battleship. With its subsequent modifications, this project had for its object extending the depth of the channel over projecting rocks at an estimated cost of $8,757,183.

About 70 per cent of the work has been completed.

On March 2, 1912, Col. W. M. Black, United States district engineer at New York, under acts of Congress approved March 2, 1907, and March 3, 1909, submitted a report of the survey of the East River and Hell Gate (H. Doc. 188, 63d Cong., 1st sess.), in which he reported favorably upon an amendment of the project for further improvement at an expense of $32,533,501, providing for a through channel 35 feet deep, with access to the wharves to a depth of 30 feet, and the improvement of the Harlem or Bronx Kills, to provide a short cut for boats passing from the Harlem, which will be the natural outlet for the State barge canal into the East River; and Little Hell Gate, as a means of reducing the tidal velocities and diminishing, if not avoiding, the consequent dangers at Hell Gate. The Chief of Engineers modified the recommendations of Col. Black by reducing the estimate "for the present" to $13,400,000, which, largely through the efforts of our late lamented colleague, Col. Joseph A. Goulden, was included in the bill reported by the Rivers and Harbors Committee and passed the House in the Sixty-third Congress, first session, but failed in the Senate. Meanwhile no further appropriations have been made for the improvement of the East River; and while there is an unexpended balance of $2,551.939 now of the amount originally authorized, the Chief of Engineers reported in 1914 and again in 1915:

It is believed that the present 26-foot project has been outgrown by the commercial interests involved, and that further work on this project is now economically inadvisable. No estimate is therefore submitted for operations in connection with said project during the fiscal year 1917.

And I may add that nothing has been expended since 1912 upon this great waterway. And if the immediate decisive action is not taken by Congress before we are able to secure the adoption of the modified project for $13,400,000 "to meet the present demands," it will be then as obsolete as is now the project of 1868; so that by the time we will be able to secure the ultimate adoption of the project for $33,000,000, as recommended by Col. Black, the commercial interest involved will so far have outgrown the port of New York that it will live only in history. In fact, its commerce is being most seriously interfered with to-day, because the Interstate Commerce Commission has established differential rates against New York, and which, I am told, has diverted enormous shipments of grain and other freight through Canadian and southern ports. I do not believe that the patriotism of our people will sanction discrimination against New York in favor of foreign ports.

The report of the Chief of Engineers adds:

As a result of a careful canvas the commerce of the East River in the calendar year 1914 appears to have amounted to 46,553,605 short tons, valued at $1,537,239,286, and that the number of passengers carried was 22,436,151.

And the fact that the 30-foot and 31-foot battleships built, and now being built, at the Brooklyn Navy Yard can only be floated in or out on high tide at the rate of one ship per day was recently called to the attention of this House by the Secretary of the Navy, who urged the immediate necessity of this improvement. But it is reported that the Rivers and Harbors Committee will not take on any new projects at this session, which settles the question, unless you gentlemen give us unanimous consent for the consideration of this matter in a separate bill or resolution.

Is there anyone who doubts that the unusual commercial importance of the East River, Harlem River, and the Harlem or Bronx Kills and their continued improvement to meet the insistent demands of the commerce of the metropolis differentiates these to a large degree from any other project; and should not, therefore, the harbor of New York be made a matter of special consideration and not included in the river and harbor bill? Let us take, for instance, the question of the improvement of the Harlem or Bronx Kills.

The rivers and harbors act of June 13, 1902, directed a preliminary examination of the Harlem or Bronx Kills, which was made and reported by Col. Mansfield on July 28, 1902, whose report was reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and their report, dated November 11, 1903, concludes with the words:

In view of the great present and prospective benefits that would result, it is advisable to undertake the improvement of the Harlem Kills to a depth of 18 feet at mean low water, at a cost of $1,899,480.

There is a recommendation made 14 years ago, and what has been done meanwhile?

In 1903 the Legislature of the State of New York adopted a project for the improvement of the Erie and connecting canals to a depth of 12 feet, and authorized a bond issue of $101,000,000 and $7,000,000, to which have been added by subsequent enactments $19,000,000 and $27,000,000, making a total of $154,000,000 to complete the project and construct terminals. Yet while the people of the State of New York, with far-sighted statesmanship, and appreciating the necessity of this development in order to accommodate the commerce of the great Northwest and to regain that which has been diverted through Canadian ports—and upon the completion of the pending improvements of the Welland Canal even greater will be the competition to the port of New York—have expended upon the development of their interior waterways more than $200,000,000—that is, a State having 10 per cent of the population of the whole United States have appropriated an amount equal to 25 per cent of that appropriated by the Federal Congress for the whole United States, and yet have been unable to secure the cooperation of the Federal Government in the development of this improvement of the Harlem or Bronx Kills, the importance of which can not be overestimated, because the tremendous tonnage which will be brought from the great Northwest down the State Barge Canal and the Hudson River must be diverted in order to relieve congestion in the lower Hudson River, through the Harlem River, and under present conditions boats intending to go up the East River and Long Island Sound are compelled to continue on their course down to Ninety-first Street and through tortuous Hell Gate, whereas upon the improvement of the Harlem or Bronx Kills these vessels can cut through between Randalls Island and the mainland, making a saving in distance of approximately 11 miles and avoiding the danger of Hell Gate. Moreover, Col. Black in his report says:

It is considered that this channel would be commercially advantageous in four ways: (1) By assisting in the reduction of the excessive-current velocities in Hell Gate, by permitting more water to pass between the upper East River and the basin about Mill Rock through the lower Harlem River, instead of having to pass through Hell Gate; (2) by affording a direct and short passage to traffic between the upper East River and the Harlem and Hudson Rivers; (3) by diverting a portion of the traffic from the crooked, narrow, and overcrowded reaches of the East River to west and south of Wards Island; and (4) by increasing the circulation of water in the Harlem River south of the entrance to the Kills, thus reducing the annual deposit of silt in that reach.

Further, Col. Black says with respect to the current velocities through Hell Gate, which, through certain stages of the tide, are so great as to endanger navigation seriously, that by careful investigation he has arrived at the conclusion that if the Harlem Kills were improved, the maximum mean velocities of a mean tide in Hell Gate would be reduced by 1.1 miles per hour, or 28 per cent, for north-bound currents and by a proportionate amount for south bound, and that these results would be attended by favorable influences on navigation and sanitation in the Harlem River.

I am astounded to find that there never has been an examination and report by the engineers upon the effect of the $154,000,000 improvement of the State Barge Canal with reference to the commercial development of the lower Harlem and East Rivers since the State Barge Canal improvement act was adopted; and there has been no action by any Congress since that time tending to effect cooperation at this point with the State authorities. I do not criticize the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, but, to my mind, this fully illustrates the absolute necessity for the consideration of the conditions in the port of New York by special legislation and not as a part of the great and laborious work of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The conditions at New York are such they can not be controlled by a rule adopted to govern conditions in rural localities.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall presently introduce a resolution to meet the needs of the situation at New York with a view to authorizing an appropriation sufficient to undertake and carry forward all pending and reported improvements of the harbor of New York in accordance with the commercial necessities not only of the present day but as the best judgment of this House can determine as to the future.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. RAUCH.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. CARAWAY.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, representing the district I do, I shall support this measure. That district I have the honor to represent is composed of 11 counties, and a portion of every one of those counties is now under water. We have in the State of Arkansas at this time flood conditions extending up and down the Mississippi River for a distance of 72 miles, and in some places 60 miles in width and between 2,000 and 3,000 square miles of our territory is now under water from 2 to 7 feet in depth. The district I represent has 350 miles of Mississippi River front. Crossing it are five navigable streams. Every one of those streams subjects the country surrounding it to overflow. The subject of this resolution, therefore, vitally affects everybody residing in my district. For that reason I realize I shall be charged with self-motives if I urge its passage. I therefor shall say only that I intend to support it. The remainder of my time I shall devote to a discussion of the local conditions now prevailing in my State, and do this in support of a resolution I introduced yesterday asking for immediate relief.

For quite a while I lived on the banks of the Mississippi River. From the front door of my house to the levees that confined the waters of that mighty river to its channel was not greater than the distance across this Chamber. I have seen every man and woman, white and black, spend days and nights fighting floods. I have seen these waters when they were more than 20 feet above the level of the land kept within an embankment 2 feet of which were but sacks of sand. Anyone who has never gone through the experience of an overflow in the Mississippi Valley will never know what it is.

The conditions are peculiar there. I have heard it charged that we come here and ask relief when we are able to help ourselves. That statement is not true. While the State of Arkansas has been admitted to the Union for nearly 100 years—it was admitted in 1836—there was no substantial progress made in that section of the State bordering on the Mississippi River until within the last generation. It is common knowledge to all that the people who go into a country to be pioneers are usually poor. Rich people prefer to stay in that part of the country where the battles for civilization and ease have been fought and won. Within the last 15 years 75 per cent of some of the counties in my district were so subject to overflow that I have seen land of the finest quality covered with fine timber sell at $1.25 an acre. We have paid there within that time for the purpose of building levees and digging ditches to carry off the surface water, in taxes voluntarily levied upon ourselves, a greater sum, twice over, than the original value of the land when we took possession of it. I have seen people without means other than the ownership of some fruitful soil that frequently overflowed, voluntarily vote upon themselves for drainage and flood protection a tax of $10 an acre or more on their land. The people who own that property do not stop at that when it comes to protection of their country against floods. In Mississippi County, in my district, I know a gentleman who spent out of his private means in one year more than $20,000 to fight floods in that county, never asked the Federal Government or anyone else to repay him a cent of this sum.

In my own town during times of distress caused by overflow I have seen practically every home thrown open to receive refugees from the flooded districts. I myself have received them until they slept four to a bed. We have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars for temporary relief for those driven from their homes by floods. This relief has been extended to all who were afflicted, regardless of race or color. It has been given freely, with the full knowledge that not one cent was ever to be returned, and there was no desire that it should be.

As I said a minute ago, ordinarily those people who are pioneers in any country, and it is doubly true in this flooded area, are people without means. They are full of energy and courage. They have gone into this section because it has great promise for the future. What they have earned in most instances they have devoted to the building of their homes and to the fight to protect them from the ravages of the rivers. They are therefore, or a great percentage of them are, poorly provided for against emergencies of this kind. The destruction of their crops and of their stock leaves them helpless, and in many instances absolute destitution and want face them. They must depend either upon private charity or upon the aid of their common country.

We have not been niggardly in providing for the relief of those who suffer disaster in other sections. I voted to extend relief to the people in Salem, Mass., when it was visited by a disastrous fire; I voted to relieve the situation of the people in Dayton, Ohio, when the floods swept away their homes; I have voted to appropriate money to relieve distress wherever it has been found; to preserve the public health and protect the public morals, and I think it therefore not unreasonable that in times like this we should look to the Federal Government for aid. We have extended it freely to all other sections and all other people. I feel certain it will not be denied to these. We are an independent people in my State. We have provided liberally for the relief of those who have been unfortunate. We have institutions where those whom nature has afflicted may be cared for in comfort, and their conditions made as pleasant as possible. We have taxed ourselves to redeem the country in which we live in far greater sums than our aggregate assessed wealth now is. We do not ask to be relieved against those burdens that are common to all sections of our country. We ask only that the Government shall in part relieve the distress of the people who have been visited by great national disasters such as this. I venture the assertion that if all the people who are now suffering and distressed from the flooded condition in my State dwelled together in one city, and such a distaster were to overtake them, it would create such public sentiment and excite such public sympathy that the Congress of the United States would rush to their relief within the hour. Then shall it be denied to these because they dwell in remote places and most of them are poor and unknown? By far the majority of these people who are at this time afflicted belong to the colored race. These have been looked upon as the wards of the Nation, but we do not now ask that the National Government shall expend one-tenth as great a sum to relieve their distress as the white people among whom they live will expend in their behalf.

We ask only that they be assisted to the extent that they may live and not suffer until this disaster shall have passed away.

I hope the Committee on Appropriations will immediately report out my resolution so that a vote may be had on it, and relief extended to those who now cry out for it.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote in favor of the adoption of this resolution. As I understand the purpose of our honored Speaker in introducing this measure, it is intended to create a committee having jurisdiction over all bills relating to flood control whether the floods occur on navigable or nonnavigable streams. Heretofore all such bills have been referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but that committee insists that its jurisdiction is limited to the improvement of the navigation of streams in order that commerce might be promoted. It is true that in carrying out this policy levees have been ostensibly constructed to confine the rivers to their channels but which have actually prevented the inundation of riparian lands and contiguous sections. This work, however, was all done under the guise of improving the navigation of the rivers for the benefit of commerce.

I come from a State where we have dry rivers and no harbors, and I want to see a committee established that will give consideration to the flood problems on nonnavigable streams. I can best illustrate the nature of the relief that the people of Arizona are seeking by recounting the damage done by the recent floods on the Gila River. I shall begin by reading an article printed in the Graham Guardian, published at Safford, Ariz. At least 6,000 acres of rich alfalfa land in Graham County, every acre of it worth more than a hundred dollars, have been washed away by successive floods, and if something is not done to stop this devastation even greater areas will be turned from fruitful farms into wastes of sand and bowlders.

GILA RIVER OVERFLOWS BANKS.

The continuous rains of the past week culminated Wednesday in the biggest snowstorm that the valley has seen in 39 years.

* * * * * * *

The snowstorm was not all the valley had as a result of the week's rain. The Gila River cleared both banks and for a time things looked serious. The waters swept over the farming lands bordering the river, carrying away land and everything in its path.

At Solomonville it almost reached the town. It spread over William Gillespie's ranch and destroyed a new crop of barley valued at $1,500.

Nearer here it swept over part of Walter McIntyre's ranch and carried away 40 hogs.

North of Safford the river overflowed into the lower fields of the Prina and Layton ranches. On the Thorpe ranch, which is located on the south bank of the river, the waters ran several feet deep and through the lumber house where the ranch hands lived.

On the Clayton ranch, east of the Thorpe ranch, the water covered the entire ranch to a depth of several feet. About 12 hogs were reported lost at this place Wednesday night.

About 2 o'clock Wednesday afternoon Herman Foster, Denzyl Thorpe, and Claude Bledsoe drove to the Thorpe ranch in a wagon and got all the bedding and clothing out of the house and then started to save the stock.

They got 6 cows and a calf to a place of safety and saved about 30 hogs, including young pigs, out of 65.

Hinton Mullenax and several others went to the rescue of Mrs. Blanche Edwards, who lives on the ranch adjoining Thorpe's, and saved all her household goods. Twelve hogs, all she owned, were last seen marooned on an island back of the ranch house.

The river overflowed its banks all the way down the valley. The roar of the waters could be heard for a considerable distance.

At Pima it was feared the bridge would go out, but the structure stood firm against the attacks of the maddened stream. The waters finally overflowed and broke through the protection of piling and rocks on the north side of the river and east of the bridge, which had been placed to turn the current. The water found a weak spot and washed out the road leading to the north approach of the bridge.

On the Pima side the road to the approach was not damaged by the river, but was overflowed by the waters from Cottonwood wash.

About 10 o'clock yesterday morning a stream about 100 feet wide was going over the road that led to the north approach, leaving only the wood part of the approach next to the bridge.

The following editorial sums up the situation:

SAVE THE RIVER LANDS.

There is so much of the farming land going into the Gila River since the recent high water that our farmers have woke up to the necessity of taking immediate steps to stop the depredations of the river.

Acre after acre has been engulfed in this vicious stream the last three weeks, and more going in daily. Some ranches have lost from 5 to 20 acres, and the total losses will aggregate nearly $50,000.

It is time our valley farmers got busy on some proposition that will lead to united action in the saving of these valuable lands bordering on both sides of the river. Further delay in the matter may mean that it will be impossible to do anything in the way of straightening the Gila River.

Already the river has made great headway east of town and in direct line with the railroad tracks. Some day, unless something is done at this point of the river, the old Gila will come flowing down Twelfth Street and head straight for Thatcher.

It is no wonder that every time I visit the upper Gila Valley the stricken citizens say to me, "Why is it that Congress can do nothing for our relief?" I am always compelled to make the same old answer, which every Congressman has made for the last hundred years, that no money is spent by the Federal Government except to promote commerce on navigable streams, and that, therefore, I can hold out no hope to them.

At Winkelman, farther down the stream, four persons were drowned in the flood waters of the Gila according to the following press dispatches:

WINKELMAN, ARIZ., January 20.

Last night the river broke in around the race track in the vicinity of the James Pruitt property. George McClaine, a teamster named Johnson, and two women—a woman known only as Ollie, and Ellen Smith—were drowned. A woman named Jean Elliott was saved.

Three men floated down the river on top of a house. The house struck some obstacle and the three men went under the water, but were rescued. Charles Osborne, Bert Vallentine, and P. H. Smith were those rescued.

WINKELMAN, January 22.

The flood is entirely over here, but the results still remain. The bridge across the Gila is entirely gone. The town is entirely cut off from the outside as far as the railroad service is concerned.

The Gila has dropped, and a search has been started for the bodies of those drowned several days ago. The body of Ollie Devore, one of the women drowned, was found about 9 miles down the river.

All those made homeless by the high water are being taken care of by local people. It is expected that many whose homes are still left will return in a day or so and start to clean things up.

Continuing down the stream the floods spread destruction in Pinal County, as is shown by the following account taken from the Arizona Blade-Tribune, of Florence, under date of January 22, 1916:

GILA OUT OF BANKS—THE BIGGEST FLOOD SINCE 1884—MUCH DAMAGE DONE.

For the second time almost within a year the Gila River bridge is impassable, made so by extremely high waters that this time caused a tremendous washout in the graded approach on the south side of the bridge, which occurred on Wednesday of this week, and all vehicle communication with the north side of the river is at a standstill, and will be until the waters recede so the river may be forded.

At dark Wednesday evening the gap between the south end of the bridge and the mainland was fully 250 feet wide. By 8 o'clock the next morning it was no less than 500 feet wide, and the water was fast eating its way farther into the mainland, until finally the entire graded approach to the bridge was eaten away and the main channel of the river had changed from its former course on the north side to the extreme south bank and is now entirely south of the south end of the bridge and is rapidly cutting away and ruining valuable farms along the river. Just how badly farms are being damaged can not be told until the water subsides.

More than half a mile of road leading to the approach to the bridge has been badly washed out, and it will cost several thousand dollars to replace it in its former condition, and little of this work can be done until the water has fallen to a low point.

The condition of some of the Mexicans living on the edge of the mesa was most pitiable. Their meager belongings were soaked with the muddy waters from the river and their houses flooded. This was caused by the water running over into the lowland just at the northern limit of the city and being backed up by the sewer levee, which finally broke, and the water flowed through onto the Kelner lands, completely inundating that property.

To save a break in the sewer line right at the north end of Main Street a dozen or more men were kept busy for several hours, and the levee was raised a foot and a half. However, farther out, the line went out in two places, taking away a hundred feet or more of the sewer.

The issue of this newspaper for the following week continues the account of the damage:

LOCAL DAMAGE BY STORM.

While no loss of life was suffered in this county as a result of the big flood of last week, a great deal of damage to lands lying along the Gila River is reported. The greatest damage done in this immediate vicinity was the washing away of a large portion of the ranch of Juan Aguilar, which lies along the south bank of the river just east of the roadway leading to the bridge. Out of between 70 and 80 acres, Mr. Aguilar now has not more than 15 or 20 acres left, and a great deal of fencing on the remaining acres was washed away. Mr. Aguilar places his loss at $3,000.

L. K. Drais also lost nearly half of his 23-acre ranch west of the Aguilar lands across the road.

The Kelner ranch, still farther down the river half a mile, lost fully 60 acres of land, which were washed away by the raging torrent of flood waters. This ranch suffered the loss of about 20 acres during the big flood of a year ago. At this point the land was not overflowed, but being a sand loam was easily washed out by the flood.

Adjoining the Kellner ranch was the 40-acre ranch of Mrs. Mattie L. Dart, and not more than 5 acres of this place remains. Mrs. Dart had just completed installing a pumping plant on her place, and was due to prove up on her desert entry yesterday. A house and barn on this place were saved from the flood by being hauled to higher ground before the water reached them. The land where these buildings stood has been washed away.

Across the river considerable damage was done to the Nicholas irrigation ditch and to lands on that side of the river. J. R. Treat is probably the heaviest loser, some 20 acres of his land having been washed away. It is also reported that Mrs. Watson's 160-acre ranch was considerably damaged, but no one has been over the property and it is not known just how badly this property was washed.

Emile Pierson, who lives 7½ miles of Florence on the opposite side of the river, was in Florence Monday, and stated that his property had not been damaged by the flood, but stated that G. W. Pattee, who recently purchased the George and Adrain Pierson ranches, had lost between 10 and 15 acres.

The J. J. Fraser ranch of 800 acres, just west of Florence on this side of the river, which is now being farmed by T. E. Moody, was damaged by loss of half a mile of ditch and the washing away of possibly 4 acres of land.

The Clemans ranch at Adamsville lost something like 10 acres of land and half a mile of ditch and some fencing.

On down the river 8 miles C. M. Shannon lost nearly a mile and a half of ditch. No damage was done to his pumping plant nor to his 600-acre ranch.

The matter of repairing the break in the south approach to the Gila River bridge has not yet been definitely determined upon. Engineer G. F. Twitchell was here Wednesday but made no statement in regard to the matter.

It is conceded that it would be a waste of time and money to rebuild the approach on its former lines and that nothing short of several hundred feet of concrete work should be considered. The gap washed in the approach is fully 1,000 feet wide and to rebuild it with earth and gravel would be folly as the next big flood would be most likely to wipe it out again.

The Gila River Indian Reservation lies just below Florence, and our Indian wards have suffered great losses that they can ill afford to bear, as is shown by the following telegram that I have just received from the superintendent of the Pima Agency at Sacaton:

SACATON VIA CASA GRANDE, ARIZ., February 3, 1916.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Recent flood damage to Indian lands and canals is more than $100,000 on Pima Reservation. Immediate relief urgent.

THACKERY, Superintendent.

That part of the valley of the Gila in Maricopa County, Ariz., known as the Buckeye Valley also suffered severe damage from the recent floods. The Buckeye Valley News of January 20, 1916, contains the following account of the flood conditions:

BIGGEST FLOOD IN MANY YEARS—RAILROADS, CANAL SYSTEMS, AND PUBLIC HIGHWAYS SUFFER BIG LOSSES.

The Buckeye Valley has been subjected to the biggest flood the past week ever known; that is, a greater volume of water has passed down the Gila River. Old-timers admit this. Several years ago the Gila was on a rampage and reached a point farther up on the highlands, but that was before the channel of the river was as pronounced as at the present time.

The water is higher, much higher than last year and damage greater.

The individual loss in this valley is not very great, but the stockholders of both canals, Buckeye and Arlington, will sustain a loss greater than in 1915. The Flower Pot's Enterprise headgates, we understand, escaped damage. The water is so high at the present writing that it is impossible to ascertain just what fate the Buckeye Dam has met, but is presumed that it is entirely swept away. The canal is uninjured. The Arlington Canal suffered quite a severe loss, and the current of the river is sweeping down through their canal for quite a distance. The dam is supposed to be intact, but a new current has been formed on the north of their headgate and has probably caused considerable damage. The Hassayampa River was also higher than for several years and this flood water undermined the flume of the Arlington Canal Co. and either destroyed or badly damaged it. The water in the Hassayampa has subsided and the river is fordable.

The Arizona Eastern Railroad, as usual, came in for their share of loss from the storm. From reliable information we learn that their loss will be greater than last year. The bridge is still standing in spite of the thousand and one reports to the contrary. The approaches on both sides are washed out in numerous places, on the west side as far up as where the wagon road crosses the railroad. We have had no mail since Monday, and it is impossible to make an intelligent guess as to when mail service will be resumed. For two days the telephone line between here and Phoenix has been out, but is now in working order.

The same newspaper gives this story of a second flood:

THE AFTERMATH.

Scarcely had the News been delivered at the post office last week when word was received that another flood was coming down the Agua Frio, Salt, and Gila Rivers. By noon Friday the gauge at the mouth of the Agua Frio above the Buckeye Dam indicated that the water was within 2 inches of the mark made by the high flood of two weeks ago. The Salt did not quite reach the high mark made by the former flood, but the Gila at this point was about the same as two weeks ago, and the damage is fully as great. There is considerable snow in the mountains and the indications are that the Gila will be a troublesome stream for weeks to come.

The Valley received no mail from Thursday of last week until Monday of this week. The long-distance telephone line was also out of commission during this time, and Buckeye was shut out from the world, and apparently by the world forgot. The telephone line is now in working order, and we are getting mail semioccasionally.

The Arizona Eastern Railroad sustained further damage on their Buckeye branch by losing more of their fill leading up to the Agua Frio bridge, but the bridge still stands.

The Buckeye Canal system is in about the same condition as the former flood left it in, except that the water from the slough north of the headgate broke into the upper end of the canal and filled it with silt and sand, but the canal is uninjured, and it will be a small matter to clean this portion of the canal.

Ranchers along the Gila River suffered fully as great a loss as they sustained 10 days ago, and some greater. Mrs. McDonald's ranch, between here and Liberty, has been toppling into the river for the past four or five days; also the Slagel ranch. Monday evening the river had eaten its way to within 120 feet of the McDonald residence, and it was necessary to move the house and other buildings up to the north line of the ranch Tuesday morning. The Slagel house, tank, and other buildings were also moved.

The Arlington Canal Co. also sustained additional heavy loss. From reliable information we learn that the headgate is badly damaged, and the upper end of the canal for quite a distance is completely washed away, and it is doubtful in the minds of many whether it will be possible to reconstruct that portion of the canal that is washed away. However, when the water recedes it may be found that the damage is not as great as is now feared.

The ranch of Thomas H. Bell, just south of the C. B. Parker place, is again almost entirely submerged and the house and outbuilding have toppled over; how badly the land is washed we are unable to state, but it is certainly in a deplorable condition now.

George Schmidt, on the old Haigler ranch, met with an additional loss of land to the amount of 5 acres, making a total of 7 acres of good rich soil that has toppled into the Gila and is forever gone.

The danger to none of these properties is past. The Gila will be high for several weeks to come, falling in the daytime and rising at night. It is not the excessively high water that does the damage; the receding water appears to undermine the bank and it falls into the river, the next high water washes this soil away, and as the water recedes again it undermines the bank and another large chunk of hundred-dollar land falls into the river.

These newspaper accounts mention but a part of the damage done by floods along the entire course of the Gila, and I would have you remember that I have confined my remarks to this one stream. As a matter of fact, great losses annually occur on every river in Arizona.

Neither shall I go into the details of the flood at the mouth of the Gila at Yuma, where the water ran 4 feet deep through the principal streets of that city, and where nearly a thousand people were left homeless. The destruction at Yuma does not come within the scope of my remarks, because the Colorado has been declared to be a navigable stream. It was a levee built by an appropriation in the river and harbor act of 1892 that broke, flooding the city. I hope to obtain an appropriation to repair this levee on the same theory which justified its original construction; that is, for the purpose of confining the Colorado to its channel in order to make it more navigable. Such an appropriation for the levee at Yuma can be recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I am hopeful that they will do so at an early date, even though it is admitted that the interests of navigation are slight.

No one doubts that Congress has power to make appropriations to promote commerce on navigable streams, for we have been spending Federal funds for this purpose for over a century, but whenever we ask for an appropriation to control the floods on nonnavigable streams the constitutionality of such a law is immediately questioned. There is no greater authority on the Constitution than Story, and this is the rule that he lays down:

The only limitations upon the power (to appropriate money in aid of internal improvements) are those prescribed by the terms of the Constitution, that the objects shall be for the common defense or the general welfare of the Union.

The true test is whether the object be of a local character and local use or whether it be of general benefit to the States. If it be purely local, Congress can not constitutionally appropriate money for the object. But if the benefit be general, it matters not whether in point of locality it be in one State or several, whether it be of large or of small extent, its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it, for it is then, in a just sense, for the general welfare.

In one sense the control of floods on a nonnavigable stream would confer nothing but a local benefit, and, therefore, Congress would have no right to authorize the expenditure of Federal funds for this purpose. But I maintain that no part of our common country can suffer an injury without affecting, in some degree, the general welfare, and, therefore, in whatever measure the general welfare may be promoted Congress can lawfully appropriate money to that extent.

For example, take the money that has been spent in the reclamation of arid land. Congress has said that since the benefits conferred are to a large extent local in their character the Government can not properly make the irrigation works a free gift to the settlers whose lands are thus made valuable. It does, however, promote the general welfare of the whole country to have the deserts and waste places changed into cultivated fields, and, therefore, the Federal Government can, under the Constitution, loan the money necessary to construct canals and reservoirs without interest.

And so it appeals to me that there could be no doubt about the constitutionality of an act which provided that the Federal Government might loan money to landowners along a nonnavigable stream for the purpose of controlling the floods that are now destroying their farms. Certainly those who receive the major portion of the benefit should pay the larger share of the cost, but to the extent that all of our people are benefited the Government of the United States should also pay its share.

Aside from promoting the general welfare, the Federal Government has a further interest in the control of floods on nonnavigable streams. A flood rarely occurs that it does not interrupt traffic on the railroads, thus interfering with interstate commerce. Every argument that can be made for appropriations in behalf of commerce on navigable streams applies with equal, if not greater, force to the safeguarding of commerce by rail.

At one time commerce, both interstate and international, was chiefly by water, but in recent years our commerce has come to be carried on mainly by railroads. Under the Constitution Congress now exercises the same jurisdiction over these artificial highways that it has always had over waterways, although there was not a railway in existence at the time the Constitution was adopted. It certainly follows that Congress has power to appropriate money, to some extent, for the control of floods that interfere with interstate commerce by rail, and it matters not whether the flood occurs on a navigable or a nonnavigable stream.

There is still another reason why our Government has an interest in flood control everywhere. Congress has power to establish post offices and post roads, yet there is not a destructive flood on any stream that does not interfere with the delivery of the mails. The United States, therefore, has a right to contribute something for the control of floods if the Postal Service is promoted and protected by doing so. This same reasoning would also justify such appropriations as means of national defense, because troops can not be readily moved or supplied when the rivers are in flood.

In order to arrive at a practical working basis for determining what interest the Federal Government has in the control of floods on any stream, and thus measuring the appropriations that can be legitimately made, it seems to me that this new committee must adopt a rule, similar to the rule now in force respecting appropriations by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that no new project shall be undertaken until after an investigation has first been made by a board of engineers. The Government engineers should be required to make findings in their report which shall include the following subjects:

First. A plan for the control of floods on the stream and the estimated cost thereof.

Second. The proportionate interest that the United States has in the project, taking into consideration the general welfare, interference with interstate commerce, the delivery of the mails, and so forth.

Third. The proportionate share of the cost of the flood-protection works that should be paid by the riparian owners whose lands would be benefited.

With this data, prepared by competent engineers, available for consideration, the committee and the Congress could act intelligently in making appropriations for flood control.

I realize that there is no greater economic question before this Congress than the adoption of a proper policy for flood control, a question that affects not only the material welfare but the very lives of our citizens. It is the bounden and solemn duty of this Government to promote the safety, happiness, and prosperity of our people by every act of legislation, within constitutional limits, which Congress may deem conducive to these ends. I know only too well that the machinery of this great Government moves with exasperating slowness, but I believe that the establishment of this committee will hasten the day when real and substantial relief can be given to those who now suffer from the devastation wrought by floods. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the pending resolution to create a flood control committee bears the indorsement of our great Speaker of the House, which shows to me that it has had his thoughtful consideration. The Committee on Rules has also given it serious thought and reported it favorably to the House. I shall give it my support, although the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which I am a member, Mr. SPARKMAN, of Florida, may enter some objections to it. I always dislike to vote in opposition to this distinguished southerner. I shall do so in this case if he takes the view of the resolution he has indicated.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I am sorry, but my time is short, I can not yield. Now, gentlemen of the House, and if there be members of the Appropriation Committee present—I see some present—I should like to have the benefit of their attention, I will say that down in the southeastern part of the State of Arkansas, mostly in my district, all along the Mississippi River, flood conditions there are reported to me as being horrible. My home city of Pine Bluff is located on the Arkansas River about 100 miles from the Mississippi, and nearly all the country from Pine Bluff to the Mississippi is under water, so to speak. Hundreds and hundreds of people are in destitute and in a terrible flood condition to-day. That is true not only in my district but out of my district. In the district represented by my colleague, Mr. CARAWAY, and in the district represented by my colleague, Mr. GOODWIN, similar conditions prevail. On the 27th day of January I received the first information concerning the flood and destitution through a telegram from the governor of my State. This great water that is in the Mississippi is unusual. The Arkansas River is on a rise now unprecedented in the history of that river. In front of my home city it is nearly 3 feet higher than ever known before. I have telegrams here that the flood water is backing up now into this city with alarming rapidity, which portends, I fear, terrible results.

So soon as I got information from the governor of the distressed situation I immediately visited the War Department for assistance, and was informed that no relief could be granted by the department; that the Congress of the United States in February—I believe it was—1913, passed a law prohibiting the department from sending food, tents, or clothing to sufferers of any character or from any cause. Because of my alarm and fear and seeing that prompt action should be taken and that a great emergency existed, I went to the American Red Cross Association of this city and called for relief. I was promised that they would send an agent down to the stricken district to investigate conditions. I have gotten nothing from any source up to date. It is said in the Good Book that "charity is the paramount virtue; all else is but as a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." And now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in this hour of great and dire distress of our people and while the citizens of my district and below and above me are appealing to you and the Senate, who constitute the Nation's Congress, for aid—for clothing, for tents, for shelter, and for rescue boats—I hope that you will not deny them. Since I have been a Member of this Congress I have always voted for the distressed and suffering people of this Nation everywhere when called upon for relief. I remember casting my vote to help the distressed fire-stricken people in the State of Massachusetts, at Salem. The same I did last year or the year before in the great flood disaster in the Ohio River Valley. I desire to read a few telegrams that I have received. Here is one from the governor of my State:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., January 27, 1916.

Hon. SAM M. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Stone, of Watson, Desha County, just phoned me to request immediate aid from Federal Government for 500 families in that vicinity who are in destitute circumstances on account of flood conditions on Arkansas River. If anything can be done, send in haste to Burnett Landing, on Arkansas River.

GEO. W. HAYS, Governor.

Here is another from people who are marooned:

WATSON, ARK., January 29, 1916.

Hon. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR,
Congress Hall Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

We are surrounded by water all the way from 3 to 20 feet deep. About 500 families are homeless. We need immediate assistance. About 1,000 head of live stock need feed. We are cut off from train service. We have lost a lot of stock and feed. Get us assistance as soon as possible. The only way to reach us is by boat to Redfork, Burnetts Landing.

One boat was found in the Arkansas River. That was sent down to take suffering people out of the flood. The other boats is a Government dredge boat and is disabled and can not travel, it is said. I want to impress this fact upon you. It is about a hundred miles from the city where I live to the Mississippi River. The Arkansas River to the Mississippi is leveed by the money of the people who own land within the levee districts, and they voted to tax themselves to build these levees, as explained by Mr. CARAWAY. Those levees have broken. Here is a telegram from McGehee, from S. P. Dixon:

MCGEHEE, ARK., February 1, 1916.

Hon. SAM TAYLOR, Member Congress,
Washington:

Levees broke at Cummins, Goree, and Douglas last night. Water covering entire territory between Grady south to Watson from Iron Mountain Railway tracks to Arkansas River. Dr. C. W. Dixon and Wallace Douglas, at Douglas, advise that immediate help is necessary. Hundreds of negroes are homeless and destitute. We want boats with 2,000 rations to come to Douglas at once. All communication cut off except telephone at Douglas. This is expected to go out at any time. Have appealed to governor.

S. P. DIXON.

I have another telegram here which I received last night from my son Dan, and you know I think that he would not exaggerate conditions. He says:

PINE BLUFF, ARK., February 2, 1916.

Hon. S. M. TAYLOR, Member Congress,
362 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Levee in front of State farm broken for several miles and whole surrounding country inundated. Towns of Gould, Pendleton, and Douglas all under water; immediate vicinity of Varner and Dumas flooded. A large number of convicts at Cummins marooned. Conditions appalling and weather intensely cold. Government boats in this river are needed for relief; their use has been denied by engineer in charge at Little Rock, saying it is dangerous for them to pass Robroy bridge. Conditions existing justify the risk. Do your best to obtain boats and all other relief the Government can afford. East end of town, from about Alabama Street to first ward school and Cotton Belt shops, under water.

DAN.

Imagine, gentlemen, the situation—people in trees, on the tops of floating houses, to escape the flood, in cold weather such as we had here in Washington last night.

Here is a letter which I have just received, written by a lawyer of prominence, residing on the Mississippi River at the county seat, Arkansas City:

ARKANSAS CITY, ARK., January 31, 1916.

Hon. S. M. TAYLOR, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Well, we are in for the deepest flood ever known. Practically all of Desha County will be under from 1 to 7 feet deep, Chicot County will get the same, and the Tensas Basin in Louisiana will be very nearly all submerged. Would not be at all surprised if we have to beg for rations.

Your friend, F. M. ROGERS.

Mr. Speaker, this is a true story of great trouble and suffering. A friend said to me the other day, "Why can not local contributions take care of the situation?" "Local contributions?" I replied; "why, our people are doing everything they can, but it takes thousands of dollars to undertake to take care of a situation so great and terrible as the one that I have described." The locality is great and all affected. Those citizens in times of normal conditions, when the water does not come from the breaking of the levees, can and do take care of every situation that comes up; but when you find them helpless, as now, away out, 20 or 30 miles, in the middle of a flooded country that is like an ocean, you can imagine how hard and costly it is to take care of the sufferers.

I have other telegrams here, which I ask consent to insert. I have messages stating lives have been lost.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

ARKANSAS CITY, ARK., January 31.

S. M. TAYLOR, Washington:

Send me at Arkansas City 100 Government tents; 500 families in destitute condition; need supplies at once, whole country under water here. Answer.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., January 28, 1916.

Hon. SAM M. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Flood sufferers at Watson and vicinity are in destitute circumstances for food and shelter, many families have had to leave their homes. Should you need more definite information wire Elbert Stone, Watson, Ark.

GEO. W. HAYS, Governor.

PINE BLUFF, ARK., February 1, 1916.

Congressman SAM M. TAYLOR,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.:

Between 1,000 and 1,500 people in Douglas section destitute, need supplies, result of flood. Others in this section similarly situated; need urgent. Can you get Government aid? We are starting subscription here to-night and will do what we can. Wire reply.

Congressman S. M. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.:

Residents of Douglas and that vicinity in a perilous situation owing to breaks in levees in Auburn and Linwood districts. Our two packet boats unable to meet all demands. Snagboat Arkansas tied up here, but Engineer Dent at Little Rock states she is unsafe to make the trip to Douglas. Old river men claim she can go to Douglas without even getting into the current or channel or in any dangerous position. Twenty-five families marooned at Douglas. Would like Arkansas for use as houseboat if nothing better. Can you render any assistance. Lateness of this dispatch caused by promise of Maj. Dent to send boat, which this afternoon was countermanded for reasons above stated.

McGEHEE, ARK., February 3, 1916.

Hon. S. M. TAYLOR,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.:

Appreciate your efforts on big appropriation. What is needed now is immediate relief along Arkansas River. Situation desperate at Douglas and Red Fork, and Pendleton Levee broke at Pendleton yesterday, drowning hundreds of cattle which had been driven there from Watson and other low territory. Doubtless some lives lost. Freezing weather. Suggest you obtain Mississippi River steamboat, provision same, and send up Arkansas River with 2,000 rations for Red Fork, Pendleton, South Bend, and Douglas. Upper territory can be handled from Pine Bluff.

Our town inundated. All parties who are able have left the town. There is still several hundred people remaining who were unable to leave. We will be in need of assistance. Make every effort to help us.

C. T. SMITH, M. D.

Telegraph and railway facilities to flooded districts cut off—have just received the following message:

SAM TAYLOR:

Your messages of this morning to C. W. Dixon, Douglas, Ark., also one to Rice, Varner, Ark., are being held at Little Rock, Ark., account of the floods. No wires or mail trains.

W. U. TEL. CO.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to appeal to the Appropriations Committee of the House to report immediately out the joint resolution favorably which I introduced calling for $250,000 to be paid out for the relief and benefit of the suffering people in eastern Arkansas, in the district I have the honor to represent, as also for the relief of those sufferers above and below my district. There need be no fear that this money will be expended unnecessarily, because the resolution provides that it shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. He will take care that no money is extravagantly used, but that it shall go directly to those who are in want and in great distress; and if it should turn out that all of this appropriation should not be needed, then what is not properly expended will be covered back into the Treasury of the United States. And if our Appropriations Committee will report the resolution favorably to this House, I feel that I know that the great throbbing hearts of its membership and their disposition to do a great charity to worthy citizens and to poor suffering men, women, and children, that the resolution will be promptly passed.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the great city of Philadelphia has never been wanting in extending the hand of relief and assistance when needed elsewhere throughout the country. She has taken high rank as a city readily equipped and able to assist those who happen to suffer calamity, but the situation before us now is one that involves other questions than that of relieving distress such as now prevails along the Mississippi Valley and these Arkansas rivers, for which the gentlemen from that State have so well spoken. There is distress there, and all of us, I am sure, would be glad to relieve that distress; but suddenly, and without notice, a very important resolution is presented to the House which proposes to create a committee, not to meet an emergency that now exists but to establish a permanent new force in this House, which may not only work for temporary relief in such an emergency as this, but which will seek, in the course of time, the expenditure of vast sums of money for permanent uses.

I have no particular quarrel with the proposition to spend money for emergency relief or for permanent relief where it may be necessary, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that if we are to spend money we must also raise money. We do not raise money, when we extend relief through some newly-created committee, on the ground that those in distress live along streams that happen to be interstate or even wholly within a State. It is by improving streams for commerce and navigation that we raise revenues of the Government, and such navigable streams should be improved if we are to obtain money to relieve such distress as is here depicted.

But overnight, Mr. Chairman, a resolution comes in here which apparently takes away from the great Committee on Rivers and Harbors its duty, to a limited degree at least, of looking after the navigation and commerce interests of the country. Heretofore the work such as is now contemplated, if I understand the purpose of the new rule, has been done with appropriations made through the Committee on Rivers and Harbors working under a systematic plan, having the approval of the engineers of the United States Government. Due to this emergency, however, and because the time is ripe—although it may not be the ripest time to talk of increased expenditures through new committees raised for special purposes—it is thus suddenly proposed to limit the work of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and give to a new committee comparatively the limited powers in recommending expenditures.

In 1879, I think it was, Congress created the Mississippi River Commission, which was to take entire charge of the work of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. That commission was not to last long, but it has lasted from that time to this, and each year increasing appropriations have been made to it through the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for the work along the Mississippi Valley. It has not been work wholly in the line of commerce and navigation. Most waterways men will concede that the Rivers and Harbors Committee has been up against the problem of making appropriations for the Mississippi and other flood rivers through the medium and excuse of commerce and navigation, much to the disadvantage of legitimate commercial waterways.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have some of the time of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Florida.

Now, it may be that the work of flood prevention, the construction of levees along the Mississippi to control the current of the river, or of any other levees on any other river, may not properly be the work of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I will not dispute that now. I believe that on one occasion I undertook by an amendment to separate the work and to take this great business of the conservation of our resources and flood control away from a purely commerce and navigation committee. But the amendment did not succeed. I am not sure that I object to the separation now, but I think there should have been some discussion of the subject, not incident to a flood emergency, but in the usual deliberative manner. I would have no objection to considering this rule if it had not come in overnight in the nature of a surprise. There is a big question here. We are confronted, for one thing, with the problem of diverting commerce and navigation money for the purposes of flood prevention. We ought not to detract from commerce and navigation.

Charges of "pork barrel" are being made in the great newspapers of the country against perfectly legitimate commerce and navigation projects. They have already suffered considerably. It has not been the fault of these legitimate projects. The attacks have been based largely upon the fact that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been obliged at times to go beyond its ordinary commerce and navigation jurisdiction and appropriate for the construction of levees which primarily were for the prevention of floods.

Of course we all want to prevent floods; we want to prevent them along the shores of New Jersey, where the sea waves sometimes sweep property into the ocean and where men and women lose their lives, just as we want protection down in the Mississippi Valley, where floods come periodically. We want to stop floods that rush over a dam at Johnstown and carrying 4,000 lives into eternity at one fell swoop, just as we want to prevent floods that course down the streams of the Middle West, even from the Northern States, until they inundate the plantations of the South. That we want to do in a general and fair way, and I do not object to the Government contributing; but I do not want for a moment to permit this resolution to go through without a protest, if it be necessary, against the plan, if there be such a plan, of reducing the earning power of the Government through legitimate commerce and navigation and turning rivers and harbors funds over to flood prevention.

The States of the South have contributed to the building of levees along their streams, and we can not charge it up to them that in the matter of self-preservation in the protection of their own property they have not done their best. But every river and harbor bill that has come in within my recollection has included appropriations, earned in part from commerce and navigation, that have gone grudgingly for the purposes of navigation and liberally for the building up of river banks to protect private property against the ravages of flood. While we are considering this resolution, therefore, we should also remember that some important legitimate projects have been unduly postponed in recent river and harbor bills, and that the revenue-earning power of the Government has suffered in consequence. I would relieve distress, but I would not check legitimate river and harbor work in doing it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman from Florida care to consume more time at this point?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] desires to use some time now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, as a member of the Rules Committee I was constrained to give this resolution my most hearty support, and I rise at this time for the purpose of speaking in favor of it.

It is my steadfast belief, based upon a good many years of intimate study and acquaintance and association and professional connection with this problem, that there is no project that can be devised by this Congress, save the one of preparation for the national defense, that is a more legitimate object for Federal aid and Federal support than the subject of flood control and flood prevention. [Applause.]

I can see, perhaps more clearly than some of those who have been Members of this House for a longer time, the questions that are about to arise because of a conflict of jurisdiction of committees, but the fact remains, gentlemen, that practically since the Government has been founded and established this question of flood control has been presenting itself at periodical times, year by year, and it is still as near unsolved as it was at the day when the first President of the United States raised his hand to be inaugurated.

It has not been settled, and it has been made a game of battledore and shuttlecock between the committees of this House, one saying that it did not have jurisdiction and jurisdiction being denied to another.

In my humble judgment and opinion, for which I claim no particular merit, it is time that there should be a committee that should have control of this question and at once commence to make the plans for the relief that is so much needed.

Gentlemen, while we talk here to-day, and as we have failed to act in years gone by, the lives of men and women and children have gone out, destroyed by the great floods of our rivers, and millions of dollars worth of property has been destroyed every year.

If any farmer or any ordinary business man in all the United States would handle a problem as the problem of flood control has been handled in the United States, it would be denounced by all who knew of it as being absolutely idiotic.

Now, let no gentlemen misapprehend what I have said. It shall be my course while I am in this House to endeavor to fully and properly observe the courtesies of debate and to refrain at all times from any harsh words.

But I do speak of the policy.

It is idiotic.

There is only one way the question of flood control can be handled, and that is by recognizing the fact that each year, or very often if not each year, a flood is coming down the channels of the great rivers and the lesser streams of the United States, that its quantity can be measured and estimated, and there must be left in the channel of that river a sufficient carrying capacity, within which man does not invade, to make safe the carrying away of these waters and insure their rapid exit either to the sea or the larger rivers.

This work can not be done in a day. The expense would be prohibitive. It can not be commenced perhaps at this time because of the more pressing needs for the appropriations and moneys of the country, but the demand for relief from floods goes up, and it does exist, and will not be satisfied until it is answered by relief being afforded the people from flood loss in practically every State in this Union.

It is in no sense of the word a local question. Take, for instance, the Mississippi River. It is fed from the streams up in Wisconsin, over in Indiana, in Illinois, in Missouri, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and other States, and then by the Ohio River with all its branches, until the streams from some 31 States go to make up the stream that flows so majestically and mightily to the Gulf.

In time of flood in the Mississippi River 2,000,000 cubic feet of water per second is flowing through the middle portion of the South; 120,000,000 cubic feet a minute, making a total of nearly 1,000,000,000 gallons of water every minute flowing in this stream, that spreads out through the country without let or hindrance, when there is a crevasse or when the levees break, carrying devastation and destruction with it.

It is a problem that must be met with a broad national spirit. It is one that must be met now, so far as plans are concerned. It is one that is crying out for solution, and it is one that will no longer tolerate delay while committees claim and disclaim jurisdiction.

There is not a President of the United States but has declared himself to be in favor of this policy for the last 15 or 20 years. When the great parties have met in convention each and every one of them went upon record as being in favor of the conservation of the life and the conservation of the property and the restraining of the waters of these streams, and to do less now would be to refuse to commence to discharge a duty that is apparent and insistent and plain.

Now, though we can not at this time, perhaps, proceed to do the actual work, a committee of Congress can take steps that will be the commencement of the relief that is demanded.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is on the Committee on Rules and unquestionably has studied this resolution. One of the main criticisms I have is as to the language "subjects relating to flood control," which go to this committee. Now, presumably legislation will be sought to prevent damage from flood. Does the gentleman understand that that includes damage to contiguous lands and, for their preservation, a reclamation of lands? Does it also include the building of levees for the purpose of preserving contiguous lands? Does it include, for instance, the construction of revetments along the river banks? Will the gentleman kindly say which one of those it includes?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. To enter into any discussion at the present time of the engineering problems that are involved, with the minute or two remaining to me, would be absolutely impossible.

The jurisdiction that is voted to this committee and will be conferred upon it, if it is established by this resolution, is for the purpose of controlling floods.

I apprehend that if the committee acts it will act in a broad spirit. I apprehend that when this provision of the resolution attempting to "control floods" will be construed, it will be construed as provisions of the Constitution are construed—broadly, and in such a way as will accomplish the purpose for which it was sought to be enacted—and, of course, the purpose for which it is sought to be enacted, upon its face and as a matter of current history, is not to relieve a temporary emergency of flooding, but to produce a condition that will relieve the recurrent floods from year to year, and thus "control floods."

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMALL. Floods do damage to channels of rivers. Will this committee have jurisdiction of damages to channels from flood waters?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I would take it, with sincere respect to the gentleman, that my friend is either opposed to the resolution or is an extremely strict constructionist, for the construction which he places upon it would be strained and unnatural and, it occurs to me, entirely unreasonable. The damage to channels from flood waters might possibly be considered, but it would not be the main power of the committee but only an incidental one.

No. The construction that should be placed upon this, unless common sense has departed from us, is in the face of emergency, when life is being lost and property is being destroyed and welfare is being threatened, to take those steps, or to commence to take those steps, that will afford an ultimate control of floods and their prevention.

It is idle to say that it can not be done. The solution of this problem affects nearly every State. It concerns us all. It concerns the good people of Illinois who have honored me with a membership in this House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Merely for the purpose of making further reply to the questions asked me, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SPARKMAN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am in favor of this resolution, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this resolution. I am not in favor of it because of any emergency that exists, but I am in favor of it as a permanent committee of this House. There is an urgent necessity for just such a committee. I live on the Mississippi River, and this committee is of first importance to all those who live along its banks. If the jurisdiction of the committee was confined alone to the leveeing of the Mississippi River for the prevention of floods, the committee would have ample to do.

The Mississippi River drains the waters of 31 States and a small portion of Canada. Probably about one-half of the entire territory of the continental United States is drained by this river and its branches. All of this immense volume of water coming from this enormous territory goes through what is known as the lower Mississippi. In recent years, probably due very largely to the cutting out of the timber in this territory, floods have become frequent and have from time to time caused great loss of life and property and great distress. Before levees were built in the seasons of floods the Mississippi from St. Louis down just spreads over the whole valley. This valley is one of the richest territories in the world; indeed, no other valley can be compared with it. Before levees were built, because of the annual overflow, the lands were of little value; but not long after the Civil War a system of levees were begun, confining the waters of the Mississippi and protecting the lands along its low-water shores. It has taken a long time to build these levees, and they are not yet complete. The Government spends annually several million dollars in building and maintaining them, and the several States through which they pass contribute many millions more for a like purpose. Under this dual system much has been accomplished; yet, as lands are cleared up above, the floods become much larger, and from time to time these levees in weak spots give way, often causing loss of life and great loss of property.

Appropriations for the building and maintenance of these levees are provided for by the Rivers and Harbors Committee and are included in the annual rivers and harbors bill. Ordinarily a lump sum is appropriated and turned over to the Mississippi River Commission for allotment, and that commission allots as it sees proper and in connection with allotments coming from the various levee districts up and down the river.

It is easy to see, therefore, that this method of dealing with a great national question, like the question of the control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River, is, to say the least of it, a very haphazard one. There ought to be a general, uniform plan to control the flood waters of this great river and for the protection of the people and lands along its banks. The task ought to be performed methodically. It ought to be taken up as a separate project, just as the Panama Canal was constructed, and levees should be built and maintained which are efficient for the purpose. There is no reason whatever why there should be floods along this river. Competent engineers have testified that if the Government would expend its money with a definite fixed plan and purpose within a term of five or six years these levees could be constructed so as to control absolutely the flood waters of the Mississippi, and at the same time give absolute protection to all that vast territory of rich lands over which without levees these waters would flow.

In determining the question of flood control in the Mississippi River there are other questions to be considered at the same time. One of these is the proper care and protection of those who live within the confines of these levees, and the other is the rights of riparian owners.

All of these questions would be under the specific jurisdiction of this committee, and it is, in my judgment, of vital importance to all those States that border on the Mississippi River. For these reasons I am heartily in favor of the bill.

I feel that I ought to say to the House that I can consider this question without reference to local conditions. Two years ago and four years ago I went before the Rivers and Harbors Committee and endeavored in every way I could to get assistance of Congress in aiding the city of Memphis in protecting itself from the flood waters caused by the building up of levees on the Arkansas side. Before the building of these levees, Memphis was high and dry, but the erection of levees caused the water to rise higher on the Tennessee side, with the result that after a number of years the upper part of our city was flooded; and two or three years ago we had a flood that greatly injured our water system, our gas system, our street car service, and caused thousands of people to be run out of their homes. It was estimated that the loss of property was over a million dollars in that one flood to the citizens of Memphis. These facts were all brought before the committee, but Congress would not help us. Thereupon the city of Memphis bonded itself for $1,500,000 and has erected within its borders for its protection a concrete levee that fully protects. These floods were thrown upon Memphis without any fault of her own. They came from some twenty-odd States of the Union. Memphis ought not to have been compelled to have spent this money for her own protection. But she has done so, and we are now protected, and for this reason I say that it is with no specific selfish reason that I favor the establishment of this committee. I do so because I believe it is the initial step of a practical, methodical, and sensible system of confining the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I think the serious objection to this resolution is the fact that by reason of its brevity it is ambiguous and will give rise to confusion in construction and to conflict of authority in committees. That is quite evident from the queries propounded to the last gentleman who spoke, Mr. SPARKMAN. There is not a proponent of this resolution who will undertake clearly to define the jurisdiction of this committee. Is it intended to take away jurisdiction from the River and Harbor Committee as it exists at present? That committee, according to the rules, has jurisdiction as follows: "Subjects relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors." By custom and practice it has been assumed that that committee has jurisdiction of all subjects of legislation affecting the navigability of rivers and harbors and improving them for commerce.

Does any gentleman say it is the purpose of this rule to diminish the power of the River and Harbor Committee as it at present exists? If so, I would like for him to say so. If not, then perhaps it is intended to give this committee jurisdiction of subjects of which no present standing committee has jurisdiction. Then, what are the subjects? The language used here are two words, "flood control." The complete rule as amended would read, "Subjects relating to flood control other than appropriations therefor, to the committee on flood control." What do gentlemen intend to convey by the words "flood control?" Presumably to prevent damage arising from floods. Damages to what? Do they mean to riparian lands and contiguous sections, to preserve them from devastation of flood waters? Is that their meaning? We have had an agitation during the recent years asking Congress for legislation to aid in the reclamation of lands subject to overflow through drainage. Is it intended under the words "flood control" that this committee shall have jurisdiction of legislation seeking to extend aid in the drainage of land so as to prevent flood waters from going over them, impairing the fertility of the land and destroying the crops? If so, why not have said so? Why have used two words the meaning of which no Member is able to explain?

The chairman of the River and Harbor Committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] asked the gentleman from Tennessee having charge of the resolution if it was intended to give this committee control of any legislation affecting the navigability of rivers, and he said, "No."

Then why not have made the rule definite and said so? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] grew eloquent and made a fine speech about the importance of flood control, which we all admit. The devastations of flood waters, both local and along those rivers which are interstate in their character, and along which flows such vast volumes of water as to be a constant menace to property and life, arouse the sympathy and invoke the aid of every Member.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Just one minute. But while we all admit the dangers of flood waters and, in so far as we may, would seek to avert them, if it was the purpose to protect riparian lands or to aid in drainage, why not have made it definite and said so, so that we might know what was the jurisdiction of this committee. I now yield.

Mr. EMERSON. Then the gentleman favors flood control, does he?

Mr. SMALL. What is flood control, please?

Mr. EMERSON. I ask the gentleman if he favors flood control—the control of these waters that devastate the land and destroy the crops.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I have always had great sympathy with those localities which were subject to damage from these floods. As a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and as a Member of this House, I have voted millions of dollars for the protection of the Mississippi River, all of which was done under the guise of improving the navigation of the river and promoting commerce, and yet, in large degree, as we knew, it was really intended to control the flood waters of the Mississippi against riparian lands.

Mr. EMERSON. Why does the gentleman quibble over mere words? Why does he not suggest some way of changing the rule instead of criticizing it?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who have considered this probably have given it very serious consideration. I never heard of the resolution until yesterday afternoon, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors heard of it only yesterday after it had been considered and agreed to by the Committee on Rules. By way of parenthesis I might suggest that if the jurisdiction of a great committee of this House is to be diminished there should have been some consultation with the chairman of that committee. With the few minutes allotted to me I might suggest some amendment to this rule which would express in clear terms the jurisdiction of this new committee, but I would like to know in advance from the proponents of the rule what jurisdiction they wish to give it, and then I will try to formulate language which will express their thoughts. If the gentleman can say what he wishes the jurisdiction of this committee to be, I will try and express it for him. But a rule has been proposed, considered by the Committee on Rules, unanimously reported, and not a member of that committee can stand up and say what legislative jurisdiction is to be given to that new committee. Was it purposely of such brevity as to be made ambiguous, subject to conflicting construction? Were gentlemen who were proposing this rule really seeking to protect riparian lands from flood waters and secure action by Congress for drainage and afraid to put it in the rule either because of constitutional objection or for fear of creating prejudice or was it done ignorantly?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the language in the rule as proposed is quite as explicit as it is in the rule now relating to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which is "to the improvement of rivers and harbors"? Who knows what that means?

Mr. SMALL. The improvement of rivers and harbors, if the gentleman is asking me for an answer, means by universal consent improvement for the purpose of making them more easily navigable and promoting commerce.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman just stated that we have raised levees for the protection of adjoining property through the Rivers and Harbors Committee under that language.

Mr. SMALL. Well, nominally. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Then nobody knows what it means?

Mr. SMALL. Nominally it was for the improvement of the navigability of the river. Let us be frank and candid with one another. Every intelligent Member of this House has voted for millions of dollars for the Mississippi River, knowing what he was doing, knowing that a large part of that money was for the protection of those fertile lands along that great river against floods; and yet, because we realized that the problem was so stupendous that it was beyond the financial capacity of any State to protect its lands against that river, we have shut our eyes and have voted these millions of appropriations, and have done it gladly, under the guise of improving the navigability of the Mississippi. That is the truth, and every intelligent Member knows it is the truth.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Inasmuch as the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have been doing that with their eyes shut, would it not be just as well to have a committee that might do it with their eyes open?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But they do not have any power to appropriate anything.

Mr. SMALL. Then put it in your rule that that is the purpose of their jurisdiction. If the gentleman is a friend of this rule, let him propose an amendment to it defining its jurisdiction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is the real purpose of the rule, would the gentleman object to the separation of the two lines of work?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the gentleman, I will make this answer: Take the great Mississippi River, if you please, and the Missouri and similar great rivers, interstate streams, the banks of which are subject to overflow, rivers which carry such immense volumes of water that in time of flood they are capable of and do inflict great damage to land and property and life.

I have always believed that by some means Congress ought to take jurisdiction of that matter in a way to solve the problem as a great national problem ought to be solved. But the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the past has been criticized because it has reported large appropriations for such streams, and river and harbor improvements have been prejudiced before the country to some extent by reason of those criticisms. Personally, I have said, and I doubt not it has been the sentiment of other Members of the House, that it would be best that the question of protecting riparian lands, property, and life from the devastation of these rivers in flood time, while a national problem, ought to be divorced from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and if this rule were so expressed as to include such activity, so that Members could intelligently know that for which they were voting and could feel that no conflict of jurisdiction would arise, I would gladly vote for this rule and would think it a proper rule.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. If it were divorced from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, under what provision of the Constitution does the gentleman think that this work of flood prevention could be carried on and money appropriated therefor out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. SMALL. I can not go into that question; and yet I may say just briefly, that for a great river like the Mississippi River I think authority could be found for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman from Florida yield me five minutes more?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can only give the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have three minutes.

Now, unless necessary I would like to proceed without interruption, because there is just one more thought I want to give to the House. I said that this rule, in the language which it contains, would give rise to confusion and conflict of jurisdiction. Flood control, as I tried to explain, might and does mean protection against damage to contiguous land, and perhaps by any means which may be deemed advisable and proper, but flood control also involves the maintenance of channels in rivers. There are various important rivers in the United States, the improvement of which Congress has assumed the jurisdiction where flood waters are not overflowing the banks, but yet are constantly changing the location of the channel; sand bars are created and various diversions of the channel are brought about, and the maintenance of those channels involves the removal of those bars and other obstructions caused by flood waters, in order that an open channel may be maintained for navigation and commerce. And they are very important rivers, and there is your question of flood control. Will this new committee claim jurisdiction of flood control against damage to the channels of navigable rivers? If not, why not? If not, why not fix this rule so that such a construction can not be given to it, but under this language proposed this committee can have, and we know will claim, jurisdiction of flood control as it affects the channels of navigable rivers.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this rule was insufficiently considered. As I say, I do not know whether this language, brief as it is—and as I believe everyone will admit, because no Member has arisen to deny it—is ambiguous and will involve conflict of jurisdiction. I say that this rule as reported did not receive sufficient consideration, or else it was done inadvertently, or else it was done purposely in order to keep the real purpose of this rule within the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress, or in order to invade the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. And gentlemen can take either horn of that dilemma. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have neither the desire nor the time to criticize the langugae of this rule, as some who oppose it have done. I understand that it was reported to the House by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Rules, and I believe that they understand the English language well enough to express the purpose of this rule. It reads for flood control. I do not believe there is a man in this House who does not know what a flood is, neither is there a man in this House who does not know what control means, and the purpose of this rule is to try to control the great floods that carry devastation through some part of the country almost every week of the year. You can hardly find a newspaper for any one week that does not give an account of a flood somewhere in Ohio, Arizona, Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, or somewhere else. I shall not speak of them, but I will speak for a moment about the grave importance of the floods that often devastate a portion of the district, that I have the honor to represent, upon the Mississippi River. I believe that you do not always stop to think of the serious aspect of these great floods. I want to call your attention to a brief sentence in a report made by Ernest Bicknell, the national director of the American Red Cross, after the great flood of 1912. I read this sentence:

> In speaking of the number of people who were driven from their homes in that flood, while the number of persons requiring temporary help in the form of food and shelter was approximately 250,000, the number for whom further help in the form of seeds for planting, repairs to buildings, fences, furniture, clothing, farm implements, and so on, was necessary, may be estimated at approximately 50,000 people.

There is a flood in the Mississippi Valley to-day only 1 foot lower than it was at that time. It is rising every day now and promises to be a record-breaking flood in the Mississippi Valley. If that flood of 1912 drove from their homes 250,000 people, whom the Red Cross helped to relieve, I have no doubt that there is the same number of people in that country driven from their homes to-day. I do not know how many, but believe that there are hundreds of people to-day from my district in the hills of Kentucky, where they have fled to get out of the water and to save their lives. It is a dreadful condition. There is in Missouri, appointed by the governor, a waterways commission. That commission made a report of the results of the flood of 1912, and in that report they state that the damage to the five counties in my district affected by the flood of 1912 was $13,255,000. More than $13,000,000 in five counties in one flood. We have had several floods since and have one now. I speak of this to show you the great importance of flood control. I have great respect for the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; I have great respect for every member on that committee. They have relieved us as best they could, but that committee was required by the rules that gave it power only to entertain and consider bills for the improvement of rivers. They have often said they could not consider bills that were exclusively for the control of floods unless they also affected the navigation of rivers. If it is true that you have got to have written in the rules, as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] seems to understand, everything that a committee of this House can do, then the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has never had any power whatever to consider bills for the relief of flood sufferers or for protection from floods, because that rule only gives that committee power to consider bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors. I hope this resolution will pass, so as to give us a committee with undoubted jurisdiction over flood control.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how the time stands now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has 44 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARRETT. Has the time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] has just spoken in reference to the necessity for some committee which has jurisdiction over the investigation of floods of this country. I wish to supplement that very briefly by calling the attention of this House to a condition that is now prevalent in the State of Indiana. There are more than 300 people in the little city of Martinsville to-day who have been driven from their homes. There are more than a thousand families along the Wabash River that have been driven from their homes. The Wabash River is denominated a navigable stream, but it is not navigated. So there is absolutely no chance for relief for the flood conditions along the Wabash River through the medium of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, because of the fact that they have not the jurisdiction to relieve the flood condition because it is not interfering with the navigability of that stream. And what may be said of the Wabash River may be likewise said of the White River, that is causing the devastation down at Martinsville. As to the flood spoken of by the gentleman from Missouri, we had a like one all along the Wabash River and throughout the State of Ohio. The city of Dayton was almost wiped out, many people lost their lives, and thousands of people not only had their homes destroyed but other property as well.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman say that this flood-control committee would have jurisdiction over the Miami River at Dayton, Ohio?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Of course they would have jurisdiction over the Miami River. There is not a river but finds its outlet to the sea, and of necessity finds its outlet in a navigable stream.

Mr. CURRY. The Miami River is all in one State, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Suppose it is?

Mr. CURRY. That is what we want to get at.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My idea is that it is the purpose of government to subserve the interests of its people, and that it is the purpose of government to protect its people. It is the purpose of this preparation we are now talking much about to protect our people against the invasion of a foreign foe. We have the same jurisdiction, it seems to me, to protect our people from the invasion of the elements, from the invasion of high water. After the flood of 1913 the various States—Ohio, Indiana, and these other States—appointed scientific men for the purpose of studying the causes of these great floods. The floods are increasing constantly in number, and constantly in violence, by reason of the fact of the great drainage that is going on in the country constantly, taking the water that used to percolate through the ground and take months and months to get away, now drains suddenly into these streams. The rain that preceded the great floods of 1912 was an ordinary rain. It commenced on Saturday night and continued for about four days. It was not a hard rain anywhere. There have been harder rains throughout our country many times, and the same experience was had in the State of Ohio.

Mr. CURRY. It has been the understanding in Congress in the past that they have no authority to appropriate for flood control on waters within the confines of one State.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The same objection was raised the other day, in that we had no authority to appropriate money for the improvement of highways entirely within one State, and it was said that the only way that jurisdiction could be extended was by reason of the fact that it might possibly be used for a post road.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The town of Seabright, on the coast of New Jersey, was inundated last year, and a great deal of damage was done, with some loss of life. Does the gentleman think this new committee would have jurisdiction to afford relief in a case of that kind?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think it would. There is not any question but that the United States has jurisdiction to improve harbors that are entirely within the jurisdiction of one State. Why? Because they have taken jurisdiction of those harbors.

Mr. CURRY. That is according to the Constitution. They have the control over navigable rivers and harbors.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It strikes me, gentlemen, that the quibble as to the constitutionality of this question is very far-fetched, for certainly the Government can find within its organic law a means by which it can protect these people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I live between the Little Miami and the Great Miami Rivers, in Ohio, within 17 miles of Dayton. Dayton was visited three years ago by one of the most destructive floods that city has known. Columbus is only a little distance from us, on the Scioto River, and it was visited by a like flood. It is not a question of whether we have a constitutional jurisdiction over those rivers, because they do empty into a navigable stream, the Ohio River. I shall vote for this rule, because it presupposes an increase of work due to an increase of floods. Floods are growing to be more disastrous every year, largely due to the deforestation of the country and also to the system of drainage, and, I might say, the encroachment of civilization upon our navigable streams. It seems to be that this is cumulative, and if it does take some work away from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors it would not hurt that committee. It will relieve the Rivers and Harbors Committee and give fuller opportunity to meet this growing necessity caused by the increase of injuries every year due to floods. Therefore I shall freely vote for the measure, believing that I am justified in so doing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have always believed that the Federal Government sooner or later would have to change the somewhat narrow policy it has pursued in the past in regard to our rivers and inland streams. I believe it will be necessary to view the river and its tributaries as a scientific whole. Of course, the great trunks are navigable streams.

I know that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has jurisdiction of the improvement of the navigable streams, or such portions of the navigable streams as they think commercial conditions require should be improved. But that is rather a narrow conception of the possibilities of improving the rivers. There are a great many streams of which the commercial possibilities would not justify improvement, and upon which there might be an increasing demand upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that they be improved under the color of commercial improvement. Unquestionably there are a great many tributaries of streams which are navigable and which cause the disturbance of navigation by flood conditions, but which are not themselves navigable from a commercial standpoint. So that the points of conflict, as I see them, between the jurisdiction of this proposed committee and the jurisdiction of the existing Committee on Rivers and Harbors are very few. So far as I can see, they are limited to the one single exception of the Mississippi River below Cairo.

So far as I know, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has not undertaken upon any broad scale works connected with both navigation and flood protection except upon the lower Mississippi. So far as I know, upon all the other propositions which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors handles, they limit it entirely to the question of navigation, and this leaves out two great elements of the control of the rivers. One is the reclamation of the adjoining land and the other is the control of floods, so far as damages to cities and crops are concerned. It is that particular portion which this new committee is designed to handle.

As to the constitutionality of any plan of flood control, I would not undertake at this time and in this brief moment to discuss it; but I do know that we have expended more than $100,000,000 in trying to put water onto irrigable land, where there was no water and which land in many cases was in private ownership. This could not be justified purely as an improvement of our own Government land. If we have that power, we certainly have the same power to take water off land where there is too much water.

As to the commercial demand and necessity for it, there is no question. These floods are devastating and damaging to a great extent. Year after year the producers and toilers and commercial people of this country suffer heavy tribute in the damages caused by these floods, and a tribute of which the State or the community can not relieve them. Where water congests at a great junction point, like the mouth of the Kaw and the mouth of the Missouri, where is located Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kans., the cause is not within local control. The waters causing the floods do not come from the States of Missouri and Kansas, but they come from the States of Iowa and Nebraska and Montana and the Dakotas. We have not control over the conditions that produce that flood. When the lower Mississippi is suffering from flood it is because the great torrents of the Missouri with all of its tributaries have poured in there. The Illinois and the Wisconsin and the Ohio have thrown their great tributary waters into the Mississippi. The people who chance to live in the Mississippi Valley, at St. Louis or at Cairo, for example, are not suffering from water collected in their community, over which they have control, but from water collected all over the Mississippi Valley higher up. That tribute every year is enormous, and it is a question for the American people whether they will make up their minds to stop the cause, and to effect the control of the floods by a broad scientific system of governmental activity, or whether the work should be limited to State, municipal, or local control, which has been wholly ineffectual in the past.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Rules, which reported this rule, and one who was present and voted to report it, I desire to say that nothing that I have heard in the debate has at all made me regret that vote.

I think that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] can be very readily answered in all of his arguments. He says that no one can define "flood control." Why, the gentleman is an able and a distinguished lawyer, and he knows that the best test of a phrase in a statute is to ascertain what has ordinarily, necessarily, or usually been done under that phrase. Now, in the River Danube and other rivers in Europe they have been working out the problems of flood control for over 500 years, and therefore what has ordinarily, necessarily, or usually been done under the head of flood control has a mass of precedents behind it, reaching back to a time prior to the discovery of the United States of America. If we had endeavored to put into the rule all of the things that have been done under the head of "flood control" which the gentleman from North Carolina says we should have done, we would have had a rule longer than the justly celebated bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] in relation to printing, and we would not have gotten it up even for consideration in the House. There is nothing in that objection.

As to the time devoted to discussion, this question of flood control has been discussed in this House to my knowledge for 10 years, and certainly that is long enough for the ordinary Member of Congress to make up his mind.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. BENNET. I will yield for a question.

Mr. OGLESBY. Under what particular provision of the Constitution have the men who have advocated this flood control during these long years thought they could get money out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. BENNET. Without taking too much of my precious time, for I have only five minutes, I will say to the gentleman that if he will read the somewhat celebrated reply of Mr. Webster to Mr. Hayne he will find that subject far more adequately discussed than I can discuss it in my brief time. I must decline to yield further, because I have not the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman an easy question.

Mr. BENNET. If I yielded to the gentleman, I would have to yield to others, and so, without meaning any discourtesy, I must decline to yield.

I voted for this rule in the committee because it seemed to me that it was right; and not only is it right, but it affords me one opportunity at least, representing the largest Democratic congressional district in the State of New York, and, so far as I have found out, the largest Democratic congressional district in the United States, to vote according to the Baltimore platform of the Democratic Party on one subject.

I have been informed by those who were here in the Sixty-third Congress that it was not at all times possible apparently for gentlemen on the other side of the aisle to vote in accordance with the provisions of the Democratic platform. I know it will please the 27,757 enrolled Democrats in my district to know that I am able to vote in accordance with that provision of the Democratic platform which says:

> We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

And I may say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], in answer to his question, and to my colleague from New York [Mr. OGLESBY] that they both probably can find an answer to their several questions in the platform, which no doubt they heartily advocated on the stump both in 1912 and 1914. [Applause.]

Equally strong declarations the same way are in the platforms of the respective parties of the 13,968 Republicans and of the 2,345 Progressives. In voting to create this committee I am voting to carry out the platform pledges of the parties whose aggregate enrollment comprises about 90 per cent of the voting strength of the district. As I am old-fashioned enough to believe in carrying out party platform promises, this opportunity to do so gives me particular pleasure.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I would not take the time to address the House on this matter were it not for the fact that we have a flood situation in Delaware which is of a peculiar sort. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asked about Sea Bright, N. J., which was devastated by a flood tide from the ocean accompanied by a northeast storm. We had a similar case at Rehoboth, in Delaware, where the entire ocean front for 5 miles or more was washed out last year, together with several blocks of city property and the houses thereon. We also have a flood situation in connection with the Rehoboth and Indian River Bays, in Delaware, and should the House create this committee on flood control, and the Federal Government be given additional authority through the creation of this new committee, I believe the situations mentioned above worthy of notice and consideration. I feel, therefore, that I should say a few words in the general debate on this resolution which I favor and intend to vote for.

In my opinion the question of flood control should be taken in charge by the National Government, and the circumstances that have been related here to-day by the Arkansas delegation in particular should impress those who are not familiar with the subject, and who are not touched by that particular matter. I realize that there will be differences of opinion between the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and this proposed committee on the matter of jurisdiction over certain bills, but in my opinion we should look beyond the mere interference of jurisdiction in the House here between committees, and consider this question as it relates to the country in its national importance.

As was shown in my few remarks on the road bill, I do not favor the Government going into expenditures such as that bill might have called forth. But flood regulation is a question that concerns people all over the country who live on navigable rivers and other streams. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it concerns them vitally, for when people need relief from floods and the attendant circumstances it is generally in an emergency, and the relief must be immediately provided. All of us have the greatest sympathy for the people living in the great Mississippi Valley, whose lands are inundated and whose property is destroyed by floods many times in a single decade. The National Government is the only governmental agency that is capable of dealing with the flood situation, and it certainly is patent to all that the time has come for the creation of a committee in this House whose duty it will be to deal with this great problem.

I for one would be willing to enlarge the scope of this committee, for the rule as amended by this resolution does not give the proposed committee the power to make appropriations. At this point I beg to state that I trust no embarrassment will come to the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by the creation of this new committee. I have listened to the arguments of the several distinguished members of that committee against this proposition, but I believe that the question of flood control is a question well unto itself and one which well warrants the creation of a committee of this House to consider matters relating thereto.

In the first part of my remarks I referred to the disastrous experience which befell Rehoboth Beach in my State. This is a large and populous summer resort located along the shores of the Atlantic Ocean. In the fall of 1914 a terrific flood tide, whipped into fury by a northeast storm of several days' duration, completely wrecked a large part of this town located along the ocean front, besides destroying the board walk and bulkheads, while a number of blocks of houses fronting along the ocean were swept bodily into the sea and their contents spread broadcast over the waters. The experience of this community in my State was only a repetition of what happened at Sea Bright, N. J., to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has referred, as well as other places along the coast. The citizens of this community in my State bravely set about repairing the damage wrought by this crushing blow, paying for the same out of their pockets. When the general assembly met in the following January, they were appealed to for State aid to erect a system of bulkheads which would protect the coast in the future. It was my great good fortune to be able to assist in the passage of this bill through the general assembly, as I was then serving as secretary of state and was in daily contact with the general assembly. I am glad that I am able to take part in a small way in advocating and assisting in the passage of this resolution, which is national in its scope, and if the committee on flood control can solve this problem which confronts a great portion of our country to-day its existence will be amply justified.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to oppose the adoption of this rule, very largely out of the great respect I hold for its proposer. Looking at the brief document submitted to us, I find that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], our honored and respected Speaker, is the author of the resolution. Out of regard for him personally I wish it were in my power to vote for the resolution. However, it does not seem to me that this is an opportune time for the introduction of such a resolution. I wish he had proposed it at the beginning of the session of Congress, when the various committees of this House were being made up. So far as I know it was not brought to the attention of the Members of the House until day before yesterday. The Committee on Rules evidently gave it very marked consideration and deep study, because one of the members takes particular pains to inform us that he was present when the rule was considered. Out of regard for the remaining members of the committee, I do not think we had better ask for a call of the roll of the attendance of the Committee on Rules when the matter was under consideration.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I should like to know if there was some member present at the meeting of the committee who favored this rule? I wanted to ask that question a moment ago, but got no opportunity.

Mr. MANN. Both gentlemen know that it would not be a legitimate question to be asked here in the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It would be legitimate to know who appeared——

Mr. MANN. Not under the rules of the House, and it would not be permissible for a member of either committee to state it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Suppose the hearings had been published. Would it be permissible for us to read them?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, is this coming out of my time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposes so. The gentleman yielded.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not yield for a general discussion of parliamentary procedure in the committee room.

I am very glad that the member of the Committee on Rules from New York [Mr. BENNET], who has recently spoken, is able in one respect to satisfy his 27,000 Democratic constituents. He said he was voting to sustain one plank in the Democratic platform by supporting this rule, as the platform adopted at Baltimore expressly states the party is in favor of flood control. Happy man! He can satisfy his Republican as well as his Democratic constituents. Why did he not speak of the large number of Republicans who, of course, voted for him? The Republican platform has a strong plank on the very same question to which he referred, namely, flood control of the Mississippi River. I quote the Republican plank on the subject:

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope, and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem. Hence we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this question is brought up at this time owing to the horrible conditions that we know to exist in some Western States. My colleague on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas, has shown you the conditions existing in his district, with which we all have the greatest sympathy. But, so far as I know, no request has been presented to this House looking for relief of that condition. If they need instant relief, why have they not introduced some resolution for that purpose? There is no man on this floor but will stand ready and willing to vote such assistance as may be desired, and no red tape of committee action will stand in the way of relieving the distress and suffering of our fellow countrymen.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the whole subject of that condition as it may exist there, now temporary in its nature, is being used as a means of appealing to this House to adopt a permanent rule, incorporating it in our rules, simply using present conditions as a psychological opportunity to appeal to the sympathies of the Members of the House. The member of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Illinois, who eloquently debated the subject, seemed to consider that the establishment of a committee, calling it the committee on flood control, would of itself prevent nature from allowing water to run down hill. It will not do it. [Laughter and applause.]

Further, I feel that there will arise conflict of authority and jurisdiction between this new committee, if created, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have no feeling in the matter whatever, but I do think it fair to call attention to the fact that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been very generous in its allotment of appropriations to the Mississippi River, the very cause for which it is evidently the intent of the proposers to establish a new committee.

Under the cloak of navigation we have made appropriations of millions of dollars and placed the amounts in the hands of the Mississippi River Commission, to expend in such manner as it might deem wise. It is, of course, true that the primary object of this commission is the construction of levees, revetment of banks, and similar work, all for the purpose of flood control and reclamation. Therefore, so far as fair treatment to the Mississippi River is concerned, the establishment of this new committee is entirely unnecessary.

I feel I must add one word of criticism to the method employed in securing such quick action on this proposed amendment to the rules. The resolution was introduced by Speaker CLARK on February 1; the Committee on Rules states that it considered it on February 2, and on February 3 action upon it comes up with only those Members having knowledge that it was to be considered to-day who were directly interested in its passage. It is not for me to criticize methods used at this time, but certainly a certain amount of courtesy is due fellow Members.

Knowing, as I do, the ability of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee [Mr. SPARKMAN], and appreciating the hard work he does in his capacity as chairman of that committee, I feel constrained to express regret that the advocates of the establishment of this new committee did not see fit to take him into their confidence. Mr. Speaker, irrespective of the merits of the proposition before us, certainly this courtesy should have been extended to that most courteous of all gentlemen, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, if I were to argue in favor of this rule on the same basis as some members of the committee have I would be opposed to it, because I have no personal interest in it, as I represent a congressional district that is probably as nearly immune from serious floods as any district in the United States. However, long before I became a Member of this House I read—and have remembered it ever since, and hope I may remember it as long as I am a Member of the House—a statement by Mr. Justice Cooley, who said that when a man went to Congress and held up his hand and took the oath of office it became his patriotic duty to say, "Not what is best for my district only, but what is best for my country."

I see all over the country a growing danger and terror of floods. I apprehend that it is largely due to the fact that in building bridges, and so forth, we are encroaching too much on the channels of the streams, and that in building bridges we do not build them high enough. I am not one who believes that the committee created by this rule could have any means of controlling the elements, although I have seen stranger things happen on the floor of this House than an undertaking of that kind. But from what I have seen of the devastation of floods and the damages, and all that follows the ravages of such calamities, I am certainly in favor of this proposition, because, if it does no more, it will show to the people of the country who are sufferers from these floods that we, their Representatives, are interested in preventing distress wherever it is possible for Congress to do so.

Such a committee can find out and report on the possibility of flood prevention and protection; and surely such frequent misfortunes demand our prompt, earnest, and most intelligent action. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the Committee on Rules yesterday when it reported out this resolution. Had I been present, I should not have voted for it in its present form. I expect the rule will be adopted, but I am clear that it ought not to be adopted in the form in which it is presented. It is entirely clear to me, as I think it must be to the membership of this House after this debate, that in its present form it will give rise to great confusion between the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and this committee on flood control.

What is meant by flood control? If they speak of unusual floods that destroy levees and property I can not conceive of a situation where navigation is not involved in that kind of flood. Do you seek to prevent floods by building reservoirs at the heads of the great rivers? That squarely involves the question of navigation. Do you want to prevent floods by revetments and levees on the Mississippi River? That, too, inevitably involves a question of navigation. Where will the Speaker draw the line in referring bills, with this new committee created? What will happen is that a bill will be presented having directly to do with navigation but declared upon its face to prevent floods. It will go to the committee on flood control, while the navigation proposition involved will be quite as important, perhaps, as that of flood control.

If we have a new committee at all on this subejct, it seems entirely clear that the jurisdiction of each of these committees should be specifically defined. If I might have had the framing of this rule, it clearly would have provided that no bills relating to navigation should go to this committee. If that had been done, there would have been no objection to it. But, possibly, Mr. Speaker, the principal object of this new committee is to consider bills not for the prevention of the kind of floods I have spoken of but those kinds of floods, not unusual in their character, but which recur year after year, overflowing bottom land on some rivers; and the design of this may be to seek appropriations not for the saving of life and property but to reclaim lands, valueless to-day, and do it at the public expense without the lands contributing one dollar to the cost of their reclamation. I, of course, do not believe the author of the rule had this in mind. So while I expect the rule to be adopted, I do say it ought not to be adopted in its present form, and I prophesy now that it will give trouble in the future on the matter of jurisdiction if it be adopted. If this rule was defeated to-day, there would be no difficulty in the Committee on Rules again taking it up and framing a new rule and presenting it to this House defining the jurisdiction of these respective committees. [Applause.]

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. Does the gentleman think the adoption of this rule would transfer jursdiction of the Rivers and Harbors Committee over the flood control of navigable streams, the waters of which rise and flow through one State only?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it would.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks this situation could be more effectively dealt with if the duties of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors were divided so that we would have a Committee on Rivers and a Committee on Harbors?

Mr. LENROOT. That might be a very good suggestion.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake, in five minutes, to discuss the technical phraseology of this resolution. I am in favor of the resolution and expect to support it not simply because of any emergency that may exist at the present time but because of the possibility that exists all of the time of an emergency being created in the matter of floods. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] a moment ago suggested that no bill or resolution had been introduced here for the relief of flood sufferers in the localities where the conditions exist. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I am sure a number of resolutions and bills have been introduced. I know that two have been introduced by myself. I know the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR] has a resolution, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] has introduced resolutions. Every man whose people are affected by the floods that are now in progress, and that come every year, have introduced resolutions seeking to relieve the people who are involved in the floods. But it is a difficult proposition to get a bill through this House, or the Congress, for the relief of any particular locality; and there is only one form of efficient relief that can come in the long run, and that is relief that takes care of the whole situation and prepares the Government to take care of the situations whether they be local or general in their nature.

In addition to what the gentleman from New York said a while ago about the platform of the Democratic Party upon this subject, I desire to call attention to the platform of the Republican Party. In 1912 both political parties now represented on this floor took the position that the Mississippi River, being a stream that drains 31 States of the Union and 41 per cent of the territory of the United States, is of sufficient national importance to justify Congress taking it up as a separate proposition. I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I think they have performed their duties as far as they could with efficiency and patriotism and with a desire to render the greatest benefit to the people of the United States; but here is a great stream that is not a local stream, the most treacherous stream that flows anywhere in the world, and now from the mouth of the Ohio River down to the Gulf of Mexico the water of 31 States of the Union is flowing through it, and by reason of the fact that heretofore the Government has constructed levees along the Mississippi River and thereby invited men to build up their homes and cultivate the soil adjacent thereto and which is now in danger, I think there is such a national problem as ought to be dealt with by Congress.

In the city of Hickman, in my district, a city of more than 6,000 people, every able-bodied man is at this moment at work seeking to protect the levee that has been constructed by the Government from destruction by the Mississippi River, and the consequent inundation of hundreds of thousands of acres of land and the homes of the people in that city. They do it not only in the daytime but in the nighttime. They do it every year; and as Judge RUSSELL suggested a moment ago, there are thousands of people from his district and from Arkansas and Missouri who have gone across the Mississippi River and are now seeking refuge in the hills of Kentucky. Is not that a national problem—to undertake to care for those people, to undertake to preserve their property and lives—and is it fair to expect the local communities, which are doing everything they can and which have exhausted their powers of taxation and their resources from a charitable standpoint and from every standpoint, to take care of the situation created by the water of 31 States which flows by their doors and inundates their homes? We speak a great deal about preparation for national defense. Mr. Speaker, there are other enemies of the country than foreign enemies, and the Mississippi River is one of the most fearful enemies to the people who live in its valley, and I think we should protect them as far as is possible from its recurring ravages. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope, in the limited time allowed me under the rules, to say what I desire to say upon this question. Sometime during this session I am going to ask the privilege of addressing the House at more length upon the importance of the question of flood control to the people of my State and district. I do not believe there is a question that will come before this Congress that is of more vital interest to the people I represent than that of flood control. If you gentlemen when you go back to your offices will get a map of the United States and look right at the center of the country, at that point situated in the lap of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers where they come together at the extreme southern part of Illinois, you will see the district that I have the honor to represent. It consists of the eight lower counties of the State, five of which border upon the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. I can not state exactly what part of the district is lowland and what part is highland, but I will say that perhaps a fourth of my district, if not a third, is what might be called lowlands, and a great part of this would be subject to overflow from the floods and back waters of these two great rivers were it not for the protection which they receive from the levees that have been constructed.

Mr. Speaker, that part of Illinois has been under cultivation since the early part of the century; and I want to say that there can not be found anywhere in the United States more beautiful, more productive, or better improved farms than those along the bottoms of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers in the southern part of Illinois; and there can not be found anywhere a class of farmers that are more thrifty, industrious, persevering, and patriotic than those who have reclaimed those fertile fields from the floods of the father of waters, protected them as best they could by the construction of levees, and converted them into beautiful and prosperous farms. Mr. Speaker, these farmers of my district have liberally expended hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the construction of levees along the two rivers, and the money they have saved and invested in their homes and other improvements are dependent for protection upon the frail levees which they have built with their own means. But year after year the great flood of waters that comes sweeping down the Mississippi River from the north and the Ohio River from the east is a source of constant terror to the people of these valleys, not infrequently washing away the banks of the rivers, altering or dividing the thread of the streams, and eating into and destroying the levees which the people have built. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in my judgment a great deal of the money which the farmers of that region have expended in the construction of levees for the protection of their farms will, before long, have been wasted unless the National Government takes hold of this flood question and assists in protecting from the ravages of these waters the levees that have already been built, and helps to build them higher and stronger.

Now, this question of controlling the flood waters of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers is not a local question. It is one of the Nation's problems. It has long been recognized to be such, but has never been properly handled. I believe that the time has come when the Federal Government should take hold of this, one of its greatest problems, and solve it. The control of the flood waters of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and their tributaries should be made a separate national project, like the building of the Panama Canal or the Alaskan Railroad. A plan should be worked out by which a coordinated system of levees and other river improvements would be constructed under scientific and continuous methods, and I do not doubt that the floods of these great rivers can ultimately be controlled, millions of acres of rich land reclaimed, and millions of dollars saved to the people each year.

Mr. Speaker, if the Members of Congress could happen to be in the Mississippi Valley during the winter and spring floods, when the melting snows from the mountains of the West and the rains from the plains of the North and Northwest come roaring down the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers to join those from the Ohio, Tennessee, and other rivers from the East, and see the terrible destruction of property and even the loss of life that the people of those valleys suffer, I do not believe that there is one of you who would not know that the question of controlling these annual floods is one for the whole Nation to solve and that it ought to begin doing so right now. Even while we are discussing this question, I am advised that the flood has reached 53 feet at Cairo and that the people all up and down the valley are being driven from their homes, while stock and grain and other property are being washed away.

No one who has not lived there or been there during these trying times can fully appreciate the awful terrors and the suffering and privation to which those people are exposed when these unusual floods occur. Yesterday I received a telegram from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Cairo appealing to me to ask the War Department to send the Government boats from places where they were stationed on the river to aid in rescuing the people and the stock from their perilous positions in the flooded districts. I called upon the Acting Secretary of War, and I want to say that he responded promptly and assured me that instructions would be sent forward to give aid wherever possible. I found that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and other Members from Kentucky, Missouri, and Arkansas were urgently appealing to the War Department for its assistance in this great calamity. Mr. Speaker, the people of the city of Cairo are not asking any aid for themselves. They are doing so for others who are not so well protected from the floods as they. Cairo has heretofore appealed to Congress for aid, and aid was generously given when asked; and I want to say here that every citizen of that thriving busy little city is profoundly grateful for the assistance Congress has given them, which, with the aid received from the State of Illinois, has enabled them to raise and strengthen the levees which protect the city. This has been a heavy burden upon the people of Cairo, but they have met it bravely and cheerfully.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there can be found anywhere a braver, more courageous, persevering, hopeful, and resourceful people than those of Cairo and other cities and towns in that valley, who year after year have spent their money, patrolled their levees, and day after day and night and day fought back the waters which almost half the Nation sends down upon them in a mad rush to the sea. I hope that whenever the Members of this House chance to pass that way they will take the time to stop off in Cairo and see what a wonderfully thriving, prosperous, and attractive little city has been builded at the confluence of those two great rivers by the virtues and the capital of its citizens, with the aid of the State and Nation. And, Mr. Speaker, a visit to Cairo, with its prosperous mills, factories, railroads, and river commerce, and its 25,000 busy and contented people, working by day and by night with faith in the protection of their wonderful levees, the gem and future metropolis of the Mississippi Valley, would, I think, be the strongest argument that could be offered for national aid in the construction of levees wherever they are needed for protection from the floods of these great rivers.

I think the time has come for the Government to declare its policy toward the Mississippi River. We can not hope for help from the Rivers and Harbors Committee, whose jurisdiction extends only to questions of navigation and commerce. I had occasion, Mr. Speaker, to take a trip down the Mississippi River this last fall from Grand Tower to Cairo, in company with some of my constituents who have studied this river question all their lives and are deeply interested. We were on a Government boat and accompanied by the Army officer in charge, and a representative of the Mississippi River Commission. I pointed out different places along the River where a little work by the Government would save a great deal of protection work that had been done in former years and now only needed repairing. I called attention to places here and there, where the Government, by a small expenditure, could prevent a cutting of the bank, or diversion of the channel, or save the levees of some of the drainage districts from ruin, and protect thousands of acres of fertile farms from overflow. To all of these suggestions we were met with the same old reply that under the present policy of the Government the department could only consider questions of navigation; that it would aid navigation for the river to remain crooked and the waters be held back, even though they did overflow and destroy the farms of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I think this whole question should be taken out of the hands of the Rivers and Harbors Committee; it should be divorced from the question of navigation. A separate committee should be provided to handle all questions of flood control. And if it should be found that the problem of flood control and the problem of navigation or commerce conflict, then it would be for Congress in its wisdom to harmonize them in the interest of the greatest number of the people. I hope the House will adopt this resolution and appoint this new committee, and that the committee when appointed will enter upon an investigation of this great national question and report out a bill at this session that will at least offer the people of the Mississippi Valley some hope for the future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has 23 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas 15.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, in the very limited time allowed me I shall not attempt to go into elaborate detail and explain to the House the awful condition in which some part of my district is placed, one county in part bordering on the Mississippi on the east and two counties bordering upon the Red River upon the west, because in a measure that has been detailed to you by my colleagues, Messrs. TAYLOR and CARAWAY; and the same condition that affects their district likewise affects mine. I think the passage of this resolution, and the creating of the committee on the control of floods will be a long step in the right direction. As time goes on we become more and more progressive, and we yield to the needs of people who are stricken. In the evolution of government we can not be guided by the past nor by precedent alone, we must make a step forward. Some gentlemen have said that inasmuch as they live remote from the overflow districts or from inundations, up in the mountainous sections of this great country, their people should not bear part of the burden of those who live upon the lowlands.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that no considerable number of the membership of this House have such a narrow and restricted view and vision. Who is thy neighbor? I can not answer that, nor can you, half so well as that great Teacher of men who while on earth answered the question for all time to come. Upon one occasion He was asked by a lawyer who sought to confuse and mystify Him by saying, "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" And the Savior said, "Hast thou read the law, and art thou familiar with the scriptures?" He said, "Yes; I have read them." "What do they say?" "Why, the law says, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, with all thy strength, and with all thy soul, and thy neighbor as thyself.'" The great Teacher said, "Thou hast answered correctly." But, Mr. Speaker, not content and still determined to mystify his Maker, he said, "Master, who is my neighbor?" Now, the Master never answered any question directly; His answers to all questions were not local, but were intended for all time, for generations then not born. He said, "Upon one occasion a man came down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and he fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment and inflicted wounds upon his body; and, leaving him half dead, they went away. Presently a priest came along, and, deaf to the importunities of the suffering man, he passed on the other side. Later on a Levite came by, and he, too, turned a deaf ear to his importunities. Then a Samaritan came along. He did not turn from him, but he went in his direction and gave relief and succor to the stricken man. He put on his raiment, bound up his wounds with oil and ointment and wine. He set him upon his beast and took him to a near-by inn and stayed there over the night; and on the morrow as he left he placed 2 shillings in the hand of the host and said, 'Take this for thy trouble, and upon my return I will pay you the residue,' and he went his way. Who," said the Saviour, "was this man's neighbor?" "Manifestly," the lawyer said, "the man who gave succor and relief to the stricken one." "Then," said the Lord, "go thou and do likewise."

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that the American Congress has always been responsive, duly responsive, to the great catastrophes that have come over this country. Need I recall that about two years ago we made an appropriation to the stricken people of Salem, Mass., where millions of dollars of property had been destroyed and thousands of poor people lost all of their worldly possessions and were driven out into the cold without money and without labor? [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, I have been criticized by those who now oppose me for voting for this bill, but I am glad that in my charity my heart goes out to stricken humanity wherever it may be found, and that my vision and my sympathies are not confined to the pigsty in my back lot, or even to my own front gate, but that in my generosity of soul and heart I would have this Government to extend a helping hand, as far as it is able so to do, where great bodies of people are sorely stricken by sudden catastrophes, where the local communities or the States are unable to give succor and relief.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how many people it would take to pay only one dollar of that appropriation that was voted for the poor, unfortunate, homeless people of Salem, Mass., on account of that fire? I have just made the figures. We have 100,000,000 American citizens, and here was an appropriation for these stricken, unfortunate people, and it would take 500 people, all being taxed equally to contribute only $1 of this amount. There are many communities in my own district, sir, which have a population of about 500, and if all of these 500 people contributed the same amount the whole 500 paid but $1 of this appropriation. Sir, the Congress of the United States has upon many occasions voted money out of the Treasury for the relief of great communities which suffered from floods and fires and volcanic eruptions, not only in the United States but to many parts of the world beyond the American Continent. Sir, my own district, the county of Chicot and the eastern part of Ashley County, in 1911 and 1912, when I first came to Congress, received many thousands of dollars in supplies, food, and the like, furnished by the United States through an earnest effort put forth by me, when all of Chicot County and a part of the eastern part of Ashley County suffered from overflows and floods; and the people of the North and the East and the West came to our rescue down there with a generous and an appreciative impulse.

Sixteen years ago the city of Galveston, Tex., was visited by a great flood which almost destroyed that great city, and you, sir, Mr. Speaker, and many other gentlemen now upon this floor were Members of Congress at that time; and you gentlemen of the North and from the West and from the East responded liberally to the stricken people of that southern city. Ten years ago next April the great city of San Francisco was visited by an earthquake, and I do not have to repeat the awful condition visited upon many of the citizens of that metropolis nor the aid and appropriation made by Congress then in their behalf. Nor need I speak of the generosity of Congress upon several occasions when fire and flood and volcanic eruptions have visited other parts of the world, notably in Martinique, Italy, in Sicily, and other places. The generous hand of this Government was responsive to the suffering thousands where their own Governments were unable to properly care for their own suffering humanity.

I only speak of this, Mr. Speaker, in reply to those upon this floor who take a narrow and less generous view of the duty of the Federal Government now in their opposition to the creation of this committee on the control of floods, for the reason, they say, the Federal Government has no authority and no right to give aid and protection to build levees; likewise as an aid and protection for the prevention of floods, when back of those levees live many millions of people who by the labor of their hands help to feed and clothe the world, and who likewise defend our country's flag in times of war and make her glorious in times of peace.

Sir, we must keep step with the demands of the times and with the growth of civilization. Unfortunately for the people of this country as well as for the people of all countries, legislation has been confined largely to the protection of property rights to the exclusion of human rights. One of the great questions to-day confronting the American Republic and to which the Congress of the United States must give increasing attention is the question of conservation—not to conserve one or two or three material aspects of the question, but conservation in its broadest and most liberal sense—to come to the assistance of the States and communities in the conservation of our soil, to prevent its erosion, and the conservation of our Government-owned forests in a system finally of reforestation; to the conservation of our mines by seeing that these are not monopolized by the greed and avarice of a few men who, unfortunately, already have seized too much of this part of the public domain, appropriating the same to their own use and behoof; to the conservation of the waters of the country, not only to prevent overflows and inundations, but likewise, Mr. Speaker, to house and reservoir these waters, that the same may be let loose from time to time not only as an aid to navigation, but to the irrigation of the dry and arid lands of many parts of our country, notably in the western and southwestern portions of the United States; and last, but not least, sir, to the conservation not only of these property rights, a few of which I have named, but, higher and above all these, to the conservation of the rights and liberties and the possibilities of the people in human endeavor, in the lengthening of their lives, and in the restoration of the health and the giving of renewed strength and vigor to the physical activities of the people.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that this view is a little more liberal and possibly a little more broad than some of my friends here in the House will agree to; but what, sir, is the function of government, for what purpose were governments created and instituted, if not for the protection of the people, to give hope and courage to their aspirations and to their ambitions. And I hope the time will never come, sir, when, as a Member of this House, in keeping with the Constitution, which all of us have taken an oath to support, that I shall fail and refuse to lift my voice and to give my vote to those things of which I have spoken, conserving not only property rights, but granting to the people what the legislation of most countries has denied—still greater rights, the rights of humanity itself.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I am going to support this resolution because my district has suffered from floods more than any other district in Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY].

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I make a like request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] makes a like request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have leave to print on this rule for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that all gentlemen may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this subject for five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am for this resolution. It seems to me that it is one of so great importance as any that could be introduced into the House. What scheme may be worked out in reference to flood control, of course, is only to be determined in the future by the action of this committee and finally by Congress. But it is such a large problem, especially in the Mississippi Valley, that the States, the municipalities, and the people generally, can not take care of it with the great amount of water that goes down the Mississippi River from the tributaries that flow into that river. It is a matter of national importance.

The Federal Government has spent up to and including June 30, 1915, $32,320,178 on the levees of the Mississippi River from Cape Girardeau to its mouth. The people living along this river have incurred a debt and spent $91,105,990. In many of the localities they have taxed themselves every way possible to secure money to build these levees. Navigation can not be maintained on the Mississippi River without some plan to prevent the constant washing of its banks.

The burden of the building of these levees and attempting to prevent floods is so heavy that these people can not alone carry on this work. All parties in their platforms have declared in favor of flood control, or, at least, for the Federal Government having control of the problem of floods in the Mississippi. The value of reclamation of lands which are now overflowed would amount, if that work were done, to hundreds of millions of dollars throughout the United States. We have inaugurated the system of reclamation of lands in the West which has been of great benefit in that part of the country, but I submit that throughout all of the United States, and especially is this so in the great Mississippi Valley, that millions of acres of the very best land can be reclaimed if some feasible way is found whereby that work can be done. I do not know, and no Member of this House knows, what the future may develop in reference to flood control; but aside from the loss of property that occurs whenever these great floods come in the rivers there is a problem of the control of floods so that these lands may become farming lands—so they will become productive each year.

In the State of Illinois the Wabash and other streams overflow thousands of acres of the most productive lands in the world, and a feasible plan has not been found whereby these floods may be prevented and in that way these lands made profitable. The system of drainage which has been inaugurated in many places along these streams puts so much water in them and so quickly it is impossible as conditions now exist to prevent these serious overflows, and as a result millions of dollars of damage to the owner of the land occurs each year. No man in this House knows now what means may be worked out for preventing these serious floods, but it is to be hoped that a committee may study this problem and arrive at some solution of what can be done. Congress would hardly be expected to appropriate money for the drainage of private land, but it can at least afford information in some way whereby it can be done and, if necessary, assist the people as is now being done in the Reclamation Service. It is a problem that must be solved in the future, and we hope this will be a start in the right direction.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reforms come and go, and another reform has gone glimmering. When our Democratic friends obtained control of the House in the Sixty-second Congress the first thing they did in the interest of economy in the public service was to abolish the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River. That committee had been in existence for years under Republican control of the House. Now, after a few years have passed since this reform was inaugurated it is proposed to establish this same committee under a different name. And I congratulate the gentlemen on the other side of the House in now admitting that a few years ago they were mistaken when they attempted to leave no committee with jurisdiction over the flood and levee problems of the Mississippi River.

Mr. Speaker, I have served in this House under four distinguished Speakers—the great parliamentarian and Speaker, Thomas B. Reed; the gallant soldier and great Speaker, David B. Henderson, of Iowa; and the Speaker who, in my opinion, will always be ranked among the great Speakers and the great men of this country, the man with the iron nerve, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.] And I serve with pleasure under the present distinguished Speaker.

Gentlemen have said here to-day that this was a new proposition. Session after session, or term after term, the present distinguished Speaker of the House has introduced into the House bills, full in character, relating to the question of drainage and control of flood waters. I do not recall whether those bills have been referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or not; but if so, they have been contributions to the waste basket. Wherever they have gone, no committee has had real jurisdiction to do anything with them. I am not in favor of the Government spending vast sums of money in the drainage of lands, either public or private, but we have reached the time in the consideration of our country when these problems must at least be investigated, and perhaps we shall be compelled to contribute something to their help, both on and off the Mississippi River.

The present distinguished Speaker of the House, whom we all admire and love [applause], seldom has made a request to this House involving his personal opinions or his personal desires. But the resolution reported to-day by the Committee on Rules reads:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri submitted the following resolution.

It is a resolution of the Speaker of the House. After long study of this subject of drainage and flood control, the Speaker of the House asks us to favorably consider a proposition to authorize a committee of the House to have jurisdiction over these subjects. I am quite willing, irrespective of the other merits of the proposition, to accede to this request of the Speaker, who so seldom makes personal requests of the House. [Applause.] And I hope that the resolution will be treated both as its merits and its source deserve, and that it may receive the unanimous vote of both sides of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the State of Louisiana is vitally interested in this problem, and the prosperity and welfare of her people are, in my opinion, largely dependent upon the passage of this resolution, the purpose of which is to create a committee the functions of which shall be to deal with the problems arising out of recurrent floods upon the Mississippi and other rivers in the United States. We have heard here this afternoon the statements of the gentlemen from Ohio, from Illinois, from Missouri, from Tennessee, and from Arkansas concerning the great volume of water coming down from the various streams in those States.

Mr. Speaker, all this flood of water, with all of its destructive force coming from all those States, and from 32 States of this Union, must eventually pass through the State of Louisiana, and this entire volume of water must, in its course, pass through the fifth congressional district of Louisiana, the great district which I have the honor to represent on this floor; and as this flood now proceeds from the rivers of those States, rushing into the mighty Mississippi, with Louisiana as its ultimate destination, there are at this hour, in order to protect our lands and the property and lives of our people on the line of levees from the imperial city of New Orleans to the Arkansas line, thousands of men who work by day and by night to avoid, if possible, the awful consequences of this oncoming flood. Mr. Speaker, this constitutes with us a flood problem, and we feel that if given a committee of this House, that could concentrate its collective thought and combined energies upon the problem of flood protection, this problem could be worked out and a final solution reached. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the State of Louisiana is in favor of this resolution. We have more at stake, in connection with this problem, we suffer more from floods, and expend more money on flood protection than any other State in this Union. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas, Judge TAYLOR, has just given a description of the loss of property and intense suffering of the people along the valley of the Arkansas River, and has told you that the flood waters of that stream must soon pass into the great Tensas Basin in Louisiana. I live in this great basin, and to show you that the charges made here by a few Members of the House that the appropriations asked for flood protection along the Mississippi is an attempt to secure money to drain private lands in the States affected is totally and wholly unfounded, I will explain that all the levee taxes collected in the Tensas Basin levee district, one of the largest districts in the State of Louisiana, is spent in building levees in the State of Arkansas, in the districts represented here by Mr. GOODWIN, Mr. CARAWAY, and Judge TAYLOR, and for the purpose of protecting the lands in that great district from just such floods as seem imminent at this time.

The fifth congressional district of Louisiana has a frontage of 200 miles along the Mississippi River, all protected by great levees, constructed by the State, the various levee boards, in connection with the Federal Government. The lands are taxed, the produce is taxed, and the citizens of that district are contributing voluntarily and gladly all the means and energy within their power, and it is our firm conviction, after years of study and experiment, that the rich domain of the Mississippi Valley and the valleys of its tributary rivers can be protected, can be made available for habitation and cultivation, and that it will become, when so protected and made available for settlement and cultivation, the richest and the most prosperous section of this Republic; that it will add more to the national wealth and provide better homes for our overteeming population than can be secured by any other means or in any other section of this country. No one doubts that this is a national problem.

Every political party has so acknowledged in its platform and each President for four administrations has so declared, and it should and must be dealt with as such.

All the great engineers who have studied and dealt with this problem have been convinced and declared that these valleys can be protected, and experience with like problems in other countries confirm their opinions. The money and the means for this purpose should be provided, not as a donation or a gift, but in the high and noble discharge of a supreme national duty. The people of my district and of my State are fighting nobly and bravely for the solution of this problem. They remain behind these levees planning and working, carrying the problem with them day and night, striving with a courage and heroism unsurpassed in history, and they are there now with the full confidence and belief that this great Government will come to their relief and provide the means and protection that will add so much to its wealth, to its power, and to its greatness. No man can foresee or describe the possibilities of this section, but we can say that the time is rapidly approaching when this country can not develop and reach the ultimate extent of its manifest destiny without what this great valley, when finally protected and made available, will produce.

The tide of our population has reached its western limit and is now returning toward the east, and the rich lands of the Mississippi Valley is the most inviting field for settlement. Millions of dollars from the North, from the Central States, and from the East have been invested there, and the entire Nation is interested from every standpoint. This resolution is national in its scope and purpose, and will afford the means of solving one of the greatest problems now before the American people, and in the correct solution of which is lodged the prosperity and happiness of millions of our people and the conservation of the greatest asset to our national wealth.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope and believe that the adoption of this resolution will be the beginning of what I am persuaded every man considers the greatest internal improvement enterprise that this Nation has ever undertaken. I am sure that it lies back in the mind of every man who has given any attention to this flood problem that the present organization of committees of this House has made it practically impossible to do these things that everybody admits should be done with the flood problem, especially in the Mississippi Valley.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors feel themselves naturally compelled to stay in the stream when much, if not most, of the work that needs to be done must needs at times be done at some distance from the stream. The improvement of navigation will be a part of this problem and incidental to the work that must come out of it. The conservation of land that will eventually be of almost priceless worth to the Nation will also be incidental. Both things will be wrought out eventually by a program that we as well as the business men of this Nation realize that we might just as well get ourselves ready to carry out, and that is to take care of that river problem from the Gulf upward, so that it can no longer devastate the hundreds of thousands of acres of the best land on earth, and save it for the people of the world, and not alone for those in that territory. [Applause.]

I hope that the resolution, which has been offered by a gentleman who certainly understands the English language, will pass, and that this rule will go through. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire about the time again?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has 14 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has 18 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. There will probably be only one other speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended until this very moment to take any time on this resolution. The gentleman to whom I had given the time has just sent word that he will not be here.

I favored this resolution in the committee, and I favor it here, because I believe that it will result in some good. The question of the conflict of jurisdiction between the proposed committee and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors gives me very little trouble. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors no doubt does a great deal of good. The Mississippi River has been the recipient of a great deal of attention from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with a view to promoting navigation. But navigation has decreased as their attention to the river has increased in the last 25 years. There is practically no navigation on the Mississippi River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he knew how much tonnage is carried on the Mississippi River?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know what it is, but I know that it is not one-tenth of what it was 10 years ago.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thought the gentleman did not know.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And I know that it is not one-tenth of what it was 40 years ago. I know that if some committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter will undertake the prevention of floods, the inundation of large areas of land, that committee will accomplish some benefit to the people of the United States. The people are not suffering for want of navigation. The fact that they do not use the waters they already have justifies that statement. They do suffer from floods and overflows of streams throughout the entire country.

I accepted on one occasion a very important chairmanship of a committee in this House—the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River. A vast number of bills and resolutions were referred to that committee from every section of the United States. While it referred only to the Mississippi River, every stream that finally flowed into the Mississippi River claimed that it should have attention from the Congress of the United States, and those resolutions and bills were of course referred to the only committee that had anything to do with rivers at all and did not deal solely with navigation. The committee had no power to report bills, because it dealt with the improvement of the Mississippi River and all of its tributaries, under the authorities cited to the committee and such as were available to the committee, and that fact prevented any sort of action beneficial to the country, such as it is hoped will result from the creation of this committee and from the work that it shall do.

I do not belittle the work of the Committee on Harbors, but I magnify the importance of the work that may be done by the committee that is proposed to be created by this resolution, and I therefore give it my unqualified support.

Mr. Speaker, I turn over the remainder of my time, if I have any, to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used six minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand, and I suppose the House understands, that the previous question has been ordered. That was the agreement by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the agreement, that the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for 16 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am greatly obliged to Brother MANN for his compliments to me, and I indorse what he said about my three illustrious predecessors under whom I served.

This resolution or rule was introduced for the sole purpose of investigating what I think is the greatest economic question that the American people must deal with in the next quarter of a century; and for the subsidiary purpose of expediting the business of the House.

Before I forget it I wish to say that there is not a committee in the House, in my judgment, that works more faithfully, earnestly, and industriously than does the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.]

The history of committees in this House is very interesting. In the first instance, and for years, there were no standing committees in the House. When Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg called the First Congress to order under the Constitution he presided over 56 men. Rhode Island and North Carolina had not yet gotten into the Union. After they came in he had a House of 65 Members. There are 435 Members of this House. The day that President Wilson and myself went over to Philadelphia to rededicate the old Congressional Hall I figured it out that if we had the same ratio now for membership that we had under the first census, and the same population we have now, we would have 2,776 Members in this House.

Government is not an exact science. It is an experimental science. The conduct of the House is not an exact science. It is an experimental science. Originally a special committee was appointed for every particular bill or resolution. That was all right as long as they had 65 Members or a few more. As the membership of the House increased the standing committees came about as a result of parliamentary evolution. There ought to be enough of them to transact the business of the House, and no more. There ought not to be any dead committees around here.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entirely correct in his criticism of the abolition of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River. That committee had fallen into what President Cleveland called "inocuous desuetude," growing partly out of the fact of the narrow jurisdiction that it had, and partly out of the fact that the Speakers for some reason referred every bill that they could to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River ought never to have been abolished. Everybody makes mistakes, and that was one of the small mistakes that we have made since we got hold of the House. [Laughter.] It is a minor mistake. That committee ought to have been revivified and its jurisdiction enlarged and made certain, so as to embrace the whole country. The other day I resurrected a sleeping committee in this House, the Committee on Railways and Canals. That committee has been in existence ever since I have been here, and if it ever did anything I never heard of it. Some gentlemen introduced bills about canals, and I referred them to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I think the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been exercising that jurisdiction for some time; but I notified the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals that I wanted his committee to go to work and consider these bills, and he was very eager to do it. So much for that.

There are certain committees in this House—not very many—which are overworked; which have more work than they can attend to. In my judgment, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is one of them. It does not have any subcommittees, so each member of that committee is supposed to be informed about all the rivers and harbors in America, and that is too much to expect of any 21 gentlemen.

The Committee on Appropriations is overworked, although I do not see any way in the world to relieve it. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is overworked. Sometimes gentlemen on that committee suggest that I take away bills that ought to go to that committee. I take away from it every bill that I have a good excuse for passing to any other committee, simply because that committee does more work than any other committee in this House, barring perhaps the Appropriations Committee. It has too large a task. Human energy has its limitations.

In the days gone by the House has not been at all tenderfooted about creating a new committee when it needed it. It may surprise some of you to know that originally the Ways and Means Committee discharged all the functions of the Committee on Appropriations. When the Civil War came on, however, it created such a vast amount of business that went to the Ways and Means Committee, and so much more business that ought to have gone to an Appropriations Committee that Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, one of the ablest men that ever sat in the House of Representatives, who was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—perhaps it was on account of his poor health—had that committee cut in two—Ways and Means and Appropriations—and he chose to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. So for years the Committee on Appropriations reported all the appropriations in this House, until the Carlisle wing of the Democratic Party concluded they would clip the wings of Hon. Samuel J. Randall, who was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because he always moved to strike out the enacting clause of a Democratic tariff bill or to strike out everything after the enacting clause, which amounted to the same thing exactly. They did not want to demote him in terms, so they simply resorted to the process of clipping his wings, by giving the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and other committees the right to bring in appropriation bills. All this is by way of preface.

In my judgment, the control of floods and incidentally the drainage of overflowed lands is, as I said before, the greatest economic question to which the American mind is going to be directed in the next 25 years. When I was a child my father used to put me to sleep of a night by singing to me a song that—

Uncle Sam is rich enough to give us all a farm—

And at that time Uncle Sam was rich enough to do that; but now all of his good land is gone, and men who have children lie awake o'nights studying about where their children are going to find homes in the days to come. Now, here we are. There is enough overflowed land on the Mississippi River and its tributaries—I take that simply because it is the greatest river system on the face of the earth—every acre of that land equal to the best acre of land under the sun, to make a State as big as the State of Missouri, which has 69,815 square miles of territory. This overflowed land lies right in the heart of civilization, with churches and schoolhouses and railroads and markets, and all of the facilities for American life. If that land was drained and put under cultivation it would support a population of 25,000,000 human beings. Now, I do not believe that Congress is ever going to drain the public lands, or the private lands either at public expense, but I will tell you what I believe it will do. It will rig up a scheme like the irrigation scheme, except exactly the reverse as to the subject matter, by which these overflowed lands will be drained and the men who own the lands will pay for the drainage.

I am one of the men that got up the irrigation scheme. I was not very prominent in it for I was a new Member and green, but I did the best I could. It took years to get it. A man who took any part in that irrigation scheme can not ride from here to California over any great railroad route without rejoicing that he participated in that beneficent work. [Applause.]

The theory of irrigation is that all the irrigation works will be completed and not cost the Government a single cent. It is the same way with the drainage business. Last year, I undertake to say without fear of contradiction, that in the great States of Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, and Iowa alone there was destroyed a hundred million dollars worth of corn, wheat, and other foodstuffs that the people of the world ought to have had to eat.

The River and Harbor Committee had so much work to do—it was not any lack of intention, but it is so occupied with legitimate duties and it had a very shadowy kind of jurisdiction over this question—that it had not the time to attend to it. So, after consulting with several people—I could not consult with everybody—I introduced this resolution for the purpose of appointing a committee whose sole business it shall be to investigate from the best sources of information attainable to see if it is possible to prevent this destruction of property and life by curtailing the overflows of the rivers. It so happened that last year was an extraordinarily rainy year in the Mississippi Valley. It rained 12 or 15 inches more between Pittsburgh and the dry belt in the extreme West than usual. These floods were extraordinary; but at this very minute a great flood is working vast destruction.

I will confess that I do not know whether it is possible to control these floods at all; but from the way we have been going I know that we would never find out whether it was possible or not. The only thing to do, it seems to me, is to appoint a committee that will take the best advice it can get, see if a system can be devised to curtail, if that is the word, the vast amount of water that goes down the rivers, overflowing the whole country, and make them go down more gradually.

The truth is that what tends to make these great floods more than anything else is that the whole country is nearly denuded of trees and foliage. The water which took when we were boys, or before we were born, two weeks to seep into the streams runs down the furrows into the streams now in 24 or 48 hours. Something has got to be done about it.

In the meantime, if they can devise a scheme that will meet the indorsement of Congress and the country, make suggestions as to how to drain the overflowed land, they ought to do that. There has been some controversy here to-day about what jurisdiction this committee will have. If the resolution passes, as soon as the committee is organized I am going to refer to that committee all the bills having reference to the question of drainage and overflow, and that committee will have enough to do. And remember the proposed new committee can not report appropriations—not a penny. I am in favor of constituting the committee. I have no personal interest in it except that I happen to live in a district that is bordered on one side by the Mississippi, split wide open by the Missouri, and has in it four other rivers, navigable by act of Congress, and in no other way. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, the question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the bill 10385, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commencing the construction of a dam with bridge superstructure and necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River for the irrigation of Indian land and allotments on the Gila River Indian Reservation, Ariz., as recommended by the Board of Engineers of the United States Army in paragraph 217 of its report to the Secretary of War of February 14, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 791), $75,000, to remain available until expended, reimbursable under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the total cost not to exceed $200,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman wants to make a speech.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will read the hearings before the committee, he will find that this appropriation is amply justified. The department asked for an appropriation of $200,000 for this purpose, but the committee thought best to advance but $75,000 at this time, limiting the total cost of the project to $200,000. The United States has already constructed at great expense a canal on the north side of the Gila River which irrigates 10,000 acres of Indian land. There is a similar canal on the south side, but the Indians do not get the full benefit of these canals, although they have tried to do the best they can with brush diversion dams. This appropriation is justified by the report of a board of Army engineers appointed by direction of the Congress to look into this matter. I would like to know on what grounds the gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order, and if he has any justification for his attitude in the matter.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this work here is estimated to cost $200,000, but so far as I know that is a very small estimate and probably an underestimate. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, but what it is new legislation subject to a point of order. Now, as to the justification, I might say this about it. As I understand, the Gila River carries very little water anyway, and all the irrigation that is possible is by diverting the flood water.

It is possible to occasionally divert water from the floods of the Gila River, but unless there are built storage works on the Gila River near the headwaters of the river there is no permanent source of water in the Gila River. The project has been fully considered several times by the Reclamation Commission and has been universally condemned by them as a business proposition. It is feasible from an engineering standpoint, because the Army engineers say so, but I doubt very much whether they can limit the cost to $200,000 or whether it would be feasible even at that. This proposition, as I understand it, contemplates only a diversion canal. That could not store any water.

Mr. HAYDEN. It does not contemplate the storage of any water.

Mr. BORLAND. And there is no water available there for constant irrigation without some storage works.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman will remember that when he visited the Salt River project he saw the diversion dam at Granite Reef, and that it cost very much less than the reservoir.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. And if the farmers in the Salt River Valley to-day were compelled either to do without the Roosevelt Reservoir and maintain the Granite Reef Dam or have the reservoir and do without a permanent diversion dam, they would prefer to do without the reservoir. The people in all countries where they get water from torrential streams lose more by floods than they do by droughts. I was born under a canal system where we irrigate about 20,000 acres, and formerly we built little brush dams just as the Pima Indians do. A flood would come along and wash the dam out, and before we could repair it the flood had passed, so that there was no water for irrigation. Now we have a permanent diversion dam and we get the benefit of every flood that comes. That is what these Indians can do, and it is absolutely necessary that such a permanent diversion dam be constructed in order to properly cultivate their lands on the Pima Reservation.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows as well as I do that in that country a diversion dam without storage works is practically ineffective.

Mr. HAYDEN. On the contrary, such a dam is of immense benefit.

Mr. BORLAND. The whole proposition has been on the Gila River to create storage works, and that particular storage-works proposition has been an alternative proposition with the Salt. When the Salt River was adopted it was because it was considered a better proposition than the Gila. In other words, the Gila was condemned.

Mr. HAYDEN. This appropriation is justified on its own merits, whether any storage works are ever built on the Gila River or not.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say further to the gentleman that irrigation has not proceeded very rapidly for the white settlers. That is, the white settlers have not been able to avail themselves, even under favorable conditions, of the advantages of irrigation, but it has not proceeded rapidly at all for the Indians. In the Blackfeet Reservation they have spent nearly a million dollars of money, which is supposed to be reimbursable—though whether it will be or not I do not know—on that Two Medicine Lake diversion dam and storage works for the Blackfeet Indians. About 26,000 acres can be furnished with water. It was originally calculated at 40,000 acres. Out of those 26,000 acres last year 600 were cultivated, and this year it is said that perhaps a thousand acres will be cultivated. In other words, it has cost the Indians, if they pay for it, $900 an acre for storage works, and that does not take into consideration the maintenance of those works, and if you assess the maintenance of those works against the Indians, even while bringing them under cultivation, you would find that the cost was so prohibitive that the Indians would not do it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The difference between an Indian irrigation project in Montana and one in Arizona is this: When the first Spaniards came into Arizona they found the Pima Indians watering their crops. They are familiar with irrigation and know what to do with any irrigation works that may be provided for them. You take a blanket Indian, accustomed to hunting on the prairies, bring him onto a reservation, and although you may give him the benefit of the very best irrigation works, yet he does not know how to take advantage of water for irrigation. You will find that the Pimas in all their history have made beneficial use of all the water that they could get. They have been deprived of their water by appropriations farther up the stream, but they will use this diversion dam and use it well. If the gentleman will take the trouble to read the hearings, he will find that all the money heretofore spent on the Pimas for irrigation has been profitably expended.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have read the hearings, and they were very much less in their scope than the hearings we have already had on that same subject. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the hearings we have had on this very same subject when we had this proposition under consideration last year, and I want to say in this connection that the next item following is the same proposition, so that what I will read applies to both of them.

This is in relation to the San Carlos project, and I read from the hearings of last year:

Mr. BORLAND. You are also being importuned to start a project at San Carlos on the Gila?

Mr. NEWELL. That is a matter before Congress. I have been in former years enthusiastic about it, but as the years have gone by I have become less and less so. The last examination was ordered by Congress and was put into the hands of the Army engineers, rather than into our hands, it being thought possibly we were not as optimistic as we might be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Mr. Newell has reported in favor of that?

Mr. BORLAND. He says so, and he says that further experience convinced him. He says:

The report of that board is extremely interesting. It shows that on the basis of the water supply that we are furnishing to the Salt River Valley it will cost, I think, nearly $144 an acre. But they propose to furnish only 2 acre-feet per acre at the land, while we furnish at the head of the canal 4.5 acre-feet, based on many years of experience. If they furnish as much water as we do, it will cut the project down, I think, to about 44,000 acres, barely enough for the area on the Indian reservation.

He says this will not furnish over 2 acre-feet, and that it will require 4½ acre-feet per man:

Mr. BORLAND. So the report has been rather unfavorable to the Government carrying on the San Carlos project?

Mr. NEWELL. I would not say unfavorable; it has simply pointed out the difficulty, and that we should not go into the San Carlos project expecting to get as good a supply as we have on the Salt River project at the same price.

And further down:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Newell, in addition to the very considerable cost, or estimated cost, per acre of the irrigation of the lands on the Gila, I recall that former examinations there developed the fact, or was said to have developed the fact, that the Gila carries enormous quantities of silt, and that any storage reservoir built would fill up with silt in a few years. And the later examinations bore out those former statements or former expressions of opinion relative to the silting.

Mr. NEWELL. In general they have. The accumulation of silt is a most serious problem. The Board of Army Engineers in reporting upon it recommended that after a certain number of years works should be built or devices installed for getting rid of the silt—

And so forth.

Mr. BORLAND. So that you see that the cost of such a work will——

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman will be fair enough to the House to state that what he has read relates only to storage works?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. What I am talking about is a diversion dam, a totally separate and distinct matter, and which stands on its own merits and has nothing to do with the San Carlos project.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman will agree with the experience of this House, that if we spend $75,000 or $200,000 in starting some diversion works there, the next step will be storage works, because complaint will be made, and based upon good evidence, that the particular works we have built are not available until they get some storage. When they get the storage, then they will do the same way, and say they will not be available until some method is provided for relieving the river of silt. In other words, the estimate is not anywhere near complete.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have offered this amendment in good faith, and I believe that the works can be constructed within the amount stated. The two diversion dams stand on their merits and have nothing whatever to do with the construction of a reservoir at San Carlos.

Mr. BORLAND. I insist it is hardly a beginning of what is going to be a great big project, a project of perhaps $6,000,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, the object of these diversion dams is the same as every other diversion dam at various points in the West. I have in mind the Rio Grande. It is to stop the underflow underneath the sand and silt, so that these diversion dams will hold water that will be turned loose through the ditches on the farms below, whereas if there is no diversion dam it will sink underneath the sand, and every man who lives in the West knows that under the quicksand of these broad rivers in the West, this one especially, you can dig down 1 or 2 feet and get plenty of water, and then if you can stop the underflow from escaping you can impound it. That is why these diversion dams are built down to hardpan, either clay or something impervious to water, so it can not seep through.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order if he intends to make it.

Mr. BORLAND. If possible, I will reserve it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I agree very largely with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has said. I think, however, that what he said applies to the following item rather than to this item. I am of the opinion that it would not be wise to adopt the following item without further consideration of the matter by Congress, because the item is clearly a feature of a great project on the Gila, which would cost, as the gentleman from Missouri suggests, at least $6,000,000. But the item now under discussion is not necessarily a part of that general project. I think there is objection to the language of the paragraph which says, "as recommended by the Board of Army Engineers." As a matter of fact, the Board of Army Engineers did not, as I recall, recommend a diversion dam at this point.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will pardon me, in the finding of the board, page 65 of the report, to the Secretary of War—

(d) That in case the project is not undertaken until after an adjudication, a diversion dam on the reservation be constructed to improve irrigation conditions on the Pima Reservation.

In other words, whether the reservoir is constructed or not, this diversion dam ought to be built immediately.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. That particular suggestion of the Board of Engineers had escaped me. What I had in mind was that the diversion dam which was proposed by the Board of Engineers was not a diversion dam at this point, but at an entirely different point. What I started to say was this: The Board of Army Engineers did not, as a matter of fact, recommend this project at all, except under certain conditions, to wit, if on investigation it was discovered that there was a sufficient water supply available, if it was discovered that certain conditions might be met as to the acre cost.

Quite a number of "ifs" in the recommendations of the board, but none of those "ifs," so far as I know, have been met.

Mr. HAYDEN. All of those "ifs" were as to the construction of the storage reservoir; but there are no "ifs and ands" about the construction of this diversion dam, as recommended by the Army board.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman from Arizona, that while this is expensive work for what it would probably accomplish, it would, in the first place, give the people a good bridge at this point, and that, in my opinion, is a meritorious feature of the proposition.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will be perfectly willing to see the bridge feature stricken out rather than see the whole appropriation fail.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman ought to leave the bridge feature in it. I think it is an important one, and it does not greatly increase the cost of the structure very much. The structure would make available, more than at the present time, the waters of the Gila River for irrigation through the ditch that was made by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, the gentleman is more familiar technically and practically with irrigation than any man in this House. As I understand from the hearings on this particular item, they now have a ditch there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Which is intended to divert the flood waters of the Gila, or whatever water there is in the Gila, and that ditch has not been sufficient, because there is no water in the Gila at the irrigating season of the year. Would this dam supply water for that ditch throughout the irrigating season of the year?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Missouri had read the hearings in the matter——

Mr. BORLAND. I did read them.

Mr. MONDELL. I mean the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs——

Mr. BORLAND. I did so.

Mr. MONDELL. He would recall that the lock diversion dam at the intake of the ditch of the Reclamation Service——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am withholding my point of order for that purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. As I said, he would recall the fact that the lack of a diversion dam at that point rendered the ditch that had been built for the Reclamation Service of comparatively little value. That is the situation, as I understand it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Wyoming states what is exactly true.

Mr. MONDELL. And this diversion dam would at least do this. That it is going to be beneficial there can be no question, because, first, it will make that ditch heretofore built by the Government available so far as there is water in the river. It will make it available much later in the season than it is now, and it will prevent the heading being constantly and annually washed out; second, it will make possible the building of a ditch on the other side, if that is advisable, for the use of water on the other side of the river, and undoubtedly it will add very much to the value of what they already have there in the way of development. In addition to that, I am still inclined to think that the bridge feature of it is one that should not be overlooked, because there is an enormous stretch of country that would be benefited.

Mr. BORLAND. It is clear from what the gentleman says that the whole plan is problematic. Its benefit to the Indians is entirely problematic and has not been worked out by these engineers, who are specially charged with it.

Mr. MONDELL. But what I want to emphasize is this: That this work will be of a very considerable benefit. It will make useful a project we already have, and this particular work does not in any way necessarily involve entering upon the large project.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman will agree with me that we have entered hastily into these irrigation projects in the hope that they would do some good, and in many cases we have been disappointed. And this is particularly true with these Indian projects, because we always hear that the amounts spent are reimbursable from the Indians, and if they do not do any good the Indians will have to pay for them anyway. But that is not always the case. I think if we have a scientific body especially charged with that kind of work of irrigation we ought to defer to their opinion about the practicability of these works and not go into the matter simply because of the hope that they may do some good.

Mr. HAYDEN. This matter has been investigated by two different authorities: First, by a board of Army engineers, who were on the ground and spent $25,000 in making the investigation; and, second, by the engineers of the Indian Service, who have been on the ground and have drawn plans and specifications for the dam and bridge and estimated the cost. I can not see why the gentleman continues to talk about a storage reservoir and says nothing about this diversion dam.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Davis says:

Yes, sir. I wish to say, though, that I do not agree with that report and never did.

Mr. BORLAND. You did not agree with that report?

Mr. A. P. DAVIS. No, sir; it was issued before I came back from Nicaragua.

Mr. BORLAND. What discrepancy did you find in that report?

Mr. A. P. DAVIS. I thought the area to be irrigated was overestimated and the cost was greatly underestimated.

That is the same man who is still in charge of the Reclamation Service. Mr. Newell was the former chief, and this is the present chief.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me call my friend's attention to the fact, as the gentleman from Arizona is attempting to do, that what he is discussing is not the proposition we have now before us.

Mr. BORLAND. I think I understand he is not discussing the San Carlos Dam or the proposition at Florence, but he is discussing simply this diversion dam to divert water for the Pima Indians. That is a part of this general plan, which, in general, has been condemned. The only question is whether—and it is a very serious question—this $200,000 dam can be built and the land can respond to its cost as a single proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] make the point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For beginning the construction by the Indian Service of a dam and necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River at a site above Florence, Ariz., for the irrigation of Indian lands on the Gila River Indian Reservation and private and public lands in Pinal County, Ariz., as estimated by the Board of Engineer Officers of the United States Army in paragraph 138 of its report to the Secretary of War of February 14, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 791), $75,000, to remain available until expended, the total cost not to exceed $175,000: Provided, That the water diverted from the Gila River by said dam shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior to the Indian lands of said reservation and to the private and public lands in said county in accordance with the respective rights and priorities of such lands to the beneficial use of said water as may be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided further, That the construction charge for the actual cost of said dam and other works shall be divided pro rata by the Secretary of the Interior between the Indian lands and the public and private lands in said county in accordance with the area of land entitled to water, as decreed by said court; and said charge as fixed for said Indian lands shall be reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 522); but the construction charge as fixed for the public and private lands in said county shall be paid by the owner or entryman in accordance with the terms of an act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, approved August 13, 1914.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. BORLAND. I will, long enough to give the gentleman a chance to make a statement about it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation for the construction of a diversion dam on the Gila River above Florence has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 21, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. STEPHENS: Further consideration has been given the draft of an amendment intended to be made to the Indian appropriation bill, for the construction of a dam across the Gila River above Florence, Ariz., referred with your letter of December 24, 1915, requesting the views of this department thereon.

The proposed work meets the approval of this department. The provisions under which the money is to be expended relating to the control of the works, the water to be diverted thereby, and the reimbursement to the United States thereof by the owners of lands irrigable thereunder, seem to provide satisfactorily for the management and financing of the project. In order that there may be no question of the supervision of the construction of this dam, it is recommended that the words "by the Indian Service" be inserted in line 1, after the word "construction."

The amount proposed to be appropriated is $100,000, which is only part of the total cost of $175,000. For a structure of this kind it is believed that serious risk would be run in attempting to build only part of it, owing to the danger from floods and the shifting channels of the Gila River. It is therefore recommended that the amount to be appropriated be increased to $175,000, and that the item be amended by striking out the figures "$175,000" and substituting therefor the words "said sum" (line 13). This change would make it necessary to strike out the word "beginning" in the first line.

The second page of the proposed amendment contains a reference to the act of August 24, 1914, as the act under which reimbursement by the Indians of their proportionate cost of the project is to be made. This is apparently a typographical error, as no doubt the act of August 24, 1912, is intended.

A similar item which was included in the bill H. R. 20150, Sixty-third Congress, second session, was the subject of my report of January 28, 1915, a copy of which is inclosed and which has been printed in the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the United States Senate, volume 1, page 498 et seq.

In addition to the information therein exhibited, the proposed work will benefit a large number of Indians on the Gila River Reservation, approximately 3,000, by providing under existing conditions for the diversion of water to irrigate an area of over 20,000 acres of fine agricultural land on the reservation. With storage provided, the area of land would be limited only by the available water supply.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

A similar item was included in the Indian appropriation bill in the Senate last year. That bill failed to become a law owing to the filibuster at the close of the session. In his report made at that time the Secretary of the Interior said:

JANUARY 28, 1915.

MY DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: I have received your communication of January 19, 1915, requesting report upon a proposed amendment to the Indian bill making an appropriation of $75,000 for beginning the construction of a dam and necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River at a site above Florence, Ariz., for the irrigation of Indian land and allotments on the Gila River Indian Reservation and private lands in Pinal County, as estimated by the Board of Engineer Officers of the United States Army in its report to the Secretary of War, page 46, paragraphs 136–138 (H. Doc. 791, 63d Cong., 2d sess.).

This report describes the situation with regard to the diversion dam which it will be necessary to construct in order to utilize the waters of the Gila River when the San Carlos Dam is built. However, the usefulness of this diversion dam does not depend entirely upon the construction of the San Carlos Reservoir, because for many years past considerable areas of land have been irrigated by diversion through various headings of the flood flow of the Gila River above Florence. To irrigate the lands of the Pima Indian Reservation upon the south side of the Gila River at the upper or eastern end of the reservation will require the construction of such a dam in order to conserve the flow of the river to as great an extent as possible. The proposed site, about 12 miles above Florence, is at the mouth of a series of canyons through which the river flows uninterruptedly from San Carlos, but from this point on the river course is through a broad flat valley, with an immense river bed, consisting of broad deep deposits of silt and gravel. When the flow of the river is low, and when, of course, water is most valuable, the stream disappears entirely soon after emerging from the mountains above Florence.

Aside from the use which the Indian reservation may eventually make of this diversion dam, practically all of the landowners off the reservation who have been irrigating in this vicinity may receive their supply of flood water from this point of diversion.

The Gila River has just experienced one of the most disastrous floods in its history, and all the headings of the various canals above Florence have been washed away, and the earth covering through which these canals ran has been entirely removed, so that these channels can not be again constructed. The superintendent of the reservation reports also that at least one canal heading for the Indian reservation, on the south side of the river, is washed out, and the large canal, known as the Little Gila, has been very badly damaged. The land which this canal supplies with water could be reached from channels heading at the diversion dam which it is proposed to build, and when so supplied would be past all danger of future damage or destruction.

The white owners who have suffered by the recent floods might possibly secure means of constructing a dam at the point mentioned, thus insuring to themselves immunity from a recurring flood, but it might be necessary for the Government to oppose such a step in order to protect the water right now claimed for the Indians.

While there is no doubt but that, as a matter of law, the Pima Indians have a prior right to the waters of the Gila River as against all other appropriators on that stream, yet they have not been receiving a sufficient quantity of water to irrigate their lands for lack of the physical means of obtaining the same. The construction of a diversion dam at this point will give the Indians an advantage of location that they have not heretofore enjoyed, because the Government of the United States will thus actually control the only feasible point where the waters of the Gila may be diverted. The Indians are entitled to control this strategic position in order to adequately preserve and perpetuate the Government's claim to water in their behalf, and for this reason alone, whether the San Carlos Reservoir is ever constructed or not, this appropriation is amply justified.

The cost of the diversion dam itself is estimated by the board of Army engineers as $150,000, and an additional item of $25,000 should be included in order to make the necessary excavation through the rock heading, so that connection may be made with the present canal systems of the Florence district. The site of the proposed diversion is an ideal one compared with others along the Gila River, as on both sides of the river are massive outcropings of rock. The river bed is comparatively narrow and confined between hills to this one channel, and a railroad upon which to bring in supplies and materials parallels the river at this point, so that the cost would be the minimum for such work. The railroad track is high enough above the river so that no interference with its operation will result even after the dam is built. The dam will not be high enough for storage purposes, but simply a low weir a few feet above the normal surface of the river, so that water may be properly diverted into the canal, and that all of the flow at the low stages, when the water is most valuable, and which occur for long periods, may be available.

It is recommended that the proposed amendment receive favorable consideration by Congress.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,

Hon. H. F. ASHURST,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

That a diversion dam can be constructed for the amount named in this bill is shown by the report of the Board of Engineer officers of the Army, three paragraphs of which discuss this subject:

136. At the several sites for a diversion dam ledge rock is found at one or both abutments, but investigation has shown that toward the center of the river rock is not within practicable reach. However, for the lift desired, not to exceed 10 feet, a dam of the Indian type will answer.

137. Through the courtesy of Mr. G. S. Binckley, member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, the board has been able to consult the design for a diversion dam for this place prepared by the late Mr. J. D. Schuyler in 1911 and a later design prepared by Messrs. Schuyler and Binckley.

138. From a consideration of these designs and the quantities of materials required for a dam following the second design the board is able to state that the cost of the diversion dam, including head gate and silt sluice, need not exceed $150,000.

Worse floods than the high water in the Gila mentioned in the original report of the Secretary of the Interior have recently occurred, as is shown by this telegram which I have received from Mr. F. H. Thackery, the superintendent at Sacaton:

SACATON VIA CASA GRANDE, ARIZ., February 3, 1916.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington D. C.:

Recent flood damage to Indian lands and canals is more than $100,000 on Pima Reservation. Immediate relief urgent.

THACKERY, Superintendent.

I have also received three other telegrams which will give the House an idea of the necessity for this appropriation:

FLORENCE, ARIZ., February 3, 1916.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN, M. C.,
Washington:

Recent flood of Gila River damaged various canals and heads and other properties of white settlers to amount of $40,000. Have conferred with Thackery, superintendent Pima Indian Reservation, and he estimates their damage sustained by same flood as not less than $100,000.

E. W. COKER.

CASA GRANDE, ARIZ., February 2, 1916.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Conditions here serious. Demand prompt attention to avoid great suffering. Canals badly broken. Head gates and dams all washed out. Much other damage done by recent floods. Three thousand Indians and large number of white settlers dependent on waters of Gila River to mature crops. Unless something is done immediately will be left in destitute circumstances. Appropriation should be made and work started on diversion dam above Florence at once. Such dam would solve problem and be salvation of country.

J. F. BROWN.

CASA GRANDE, ARIZ., February 2, 1916.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Chamber of Commerce of Casa Grande, Ariz., urges passage of your amendment in Indian appropriation bill for diversion dam on Gila River above Florence. Absolutely necessary to enable Indians, settlers, and farmers to save crops. Situation most critical. Temporary dams out by recent floods. Much suffering unless Congress gives relief. Wire result.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
A. A. JAYNE, President.

This calamity which has fallen on the white settlers and Indians alike has forced everybody to recognize that they have a community of interest in the waters of the Gila, and that the only way that these flood waters can be put to a beneficial use is by the construction of a reinforced concrete diversion dam by the Government. These same waters that now spread destruction along the valley of the Gila can thus be controlled and made to serve the irrigators, both red and white, who are most anxious for this relief. The Indians and the white men must live together in this valley for all time to come. They have suffered alike from floods and from drought, and I want to see them prosper together in equal measure, as I know they will if Congress appropriates the money for this diversion dam above Florence.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is the larger project that the gentleman was speaking about. When the reclamation law was first passed, one of the projects that was then being considered by the Geological Survey, which had a good deal of influence on passing the bill, was the storage works on the Gila River, but after the law was passed private interests in the Salt River Valley were so much more influential and powerful that they succeeded in killing the Gila River project and in substituting for it the Roosevelt Dam on the Salt River, on which we have expended $11,000,000. It was thought by some Members at that time that we were making a mistake with respect to the relative advantages of the two projects; that we ought to have gone on with the Gila River project and not undertaken the Salt River project. But in their anxiety to kill the Gila River project, the Salt River interest did it effectually, and they secured various engineer's reports showing that the Gila project was impracticable. The great objection was that a dam on the Gila would fill up with silt in a short time. We asked them during the hearings, "If a dam silts up, what will you do?" and they answered that in India, where such projects were carried on, when a dam silts up they let it go and proceed to build another dam. You will find that given in the testimony.

I am talking about the general project, and I admit that, as a pure business proposition in all these southwestern streams, like the Gila River and the Salt River, storage works are the essential features. I do not think it would be two sessions of Congress, or maybe one, after action was had here before local interests would be here again asking for storage works. The Government might invest $400,000 in these two projects, and then it would be argued that it would be a moral crime not to give the people water, and the only way to do that would be to put in storage works.

The local interests secured the Salt River project, and now, on the Indian bill, they are trying to put in the Gila project also, before a dollar has been returned to the Reclamation Service for the construction charges on the other project, although the Salt River Valley is eminently prosperous, as I think the gentleman will admit, and is one of the most beautiful valleys in the world and full of active and energetic and prosperous people.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am coming here asking this Congress for an appropriation for this project on its own merits, it having nothing to do with the construction of the San Carlos Reservoir. Regardless of whether the San Carlos Reservoir is ever constructed or not, this appropriation is amply justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] makes a point of order on the paragraph. Unless gentlemen wish to be heard further on the point of order, the Chair will rule. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to furnish in perpetuity for the irrigation of 631 Salt River Indian allotments of 10 acres each, to be designated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, water from works constructed under the provision of the reclamation act, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto: Provided, That the reclamation fund shall be reimbursed therefor upon terms the same as those provided in said act or acts for reimbursement by entrymen on lands irrigated by said works, and there is hereby appropriated $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the initial installment of the charges when made for said water.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. It may be lack of knowledge or intelligence, but I can not tell from the reading of this paragraph whether this water is to be furnished without the Indians making a contribution for the maintenance charges or not.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indians take the water out of the main canal and handle it themselves, so there is no charge for maintenance.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not answered my suggestion at all. The bill says, "The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to furnish in perpetuity," and so forth. That directs him to furnish it. Are they to pay for the maintenance charges of it?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the law already covers that.

Mr. MANN. The law could not cover it, because this is new law.

Mr. BORLAND. The law under which it was begun, as I recollect, provided that the Indians were to contribute a certain amount toward that Salt River project, and they were to have a certain amount of water. What they really got was some wells and a transmission line for power. They were not satisfied with that. Now, it is proposed to give them the water. The original act provided that their lands should be assessed, the same as those of the white settlers.

Mr. HAYDEN. This act says that the Indians shall receive water on an additional area of land within their reservation.

Mr. MANN. What act says that?

Mr. HAYDEN. This section here. The Secretary of the Interior shall furnish water for 6,310 acres of land.

Mr. MANN. Then it provides that the reclamation fund shall be reimbursed therefor on the terms provided in a certain act. If we make an appropriation for maintenance charges, I take it that under the terms of this provision we will make an appropriation every year, probably in perpetuity, for those maintenance charges.

Mr. HAYDEN. Congress will be required to make an appropriation every year for the construction and maintenance charges. Instead of making an appropriation for the whole amount of $65 an acre for 6,310 acres, we will appropriate the amount that probably will be due next year and so on thereafter.

Mr. MANN. Will the Indian allottees pay their proportionate share of the maintenance charges of this project?

Mr. HAYDEN. They will have to, unless Congress appropriates the money.

Mr. MANN. Suppose they do not do it?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indians will not get any water until somebody pays for it.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of the Interior is empowered to furnish in perpetuity this water, whether they pay anything for it or not.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON. This appropriation here is for the purpose of purchasing the water right. The water right is worth $65 an acre. That does not pay for the charge each year for water, for the operating expenses, but it pays for the construction charges of the project.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from North Dakota the simple, easy, plain question that I have asked already and that no gentleman has answered.

Mr. NORTON. I will answer it.

Mr. MANN. Will these Indian allottees, under this provision, pay their proportion of the maintenance charges of this project?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. NORTON. Outside of——

Mr. MANN. Oh, not outside of anything.

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman says he is sure about that, I will withdraw the point of order, but I do not want to get fooled on it. I want somebody who knows to answer it. The gentlemen over there on the other side will not answer.

Mr. MONDELL. May I suggest——

Mr. MANN. No; I want somebody on the committee, who is responsible for the item, to make the statement.

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that it is not contemplated that out of this item the maintenance charges will be paid; and I will say to the gentleman that I do not know whether they will be paid by the Indian Bureau out of some other fund for the Indians; but I can answer the gentleman as to this item.

Mr. MANN. I am going to hold the gentleman to his first statement. I did not ask anything about the appropriation in this item. Here is a provision directing the Secretary of the Interior to furnish water in perpetuity. He has to do it or he is subject to impeachment, whether they pay anything or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Then I will expire also, and will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I renew the point of order, or reserve it, rather.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. I was going to say to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] that I do not intend to make the point of order, provided we can amend this paragraph——

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose we strike out all after the word "works," in line 10.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not intend to make the point of order, if we can amend this paragraph so as to make it very clear what we are trying to do.

Mr. BORLAND. Why not strike out all after the word "works," in line 10, page 19, simply providing that the reclamation fund shall be reimbursed upon terms the same as those provided for reimbursement by entrymen, and so forth, and stop there?

Mr. MONDELL. That would strike out this first appropriation.

Mr. BORLAND. That would strike out the first appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. We do not want to do that.

Mr. BORLAND. That would leave the lands clearly subject to maintenance charges.

Mr. MONDELL. I think an amendment there might be in order; but what I had in mind was to meet the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The language of the section is that the Secretary is authorized and directed to furnish water in perpetuity. Well, that language could only be used properly if in some way or other the Secretary of the Interior as an official had some water rights or some water which he in perpetuity could continue to furnish. What you intend to do is to provide perpetual water rights. That can be done by striking out the word "furnish" and inserting the words "provide for water rights."

The section would then read that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide for water rights in perpetuity for the irrigation of these lands from the reclamation project.

Mr. HAYDEN. I did not write this section, and I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman is a good one.

Mr. MONDELL. With that language there would be no question but what these lands would be subject to the construction charge, and they would be on the same basis as other lands in regard to charges for maintenance; and if that amendment were adopted, I think the objection, which was a very pertinent one, made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be met. On page 19, line 2, I would strike out the word "furnish" and insert the words "provide for water rights."

Mr. Chairman, if I may offer an amendment with a point of order pending——

Mr. BORLAND. I will renew the point of order, but I will yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming can not offer an amendment while the point of order is pending.

Mr. MONDELL. I take it that the gentleman from Arizona has no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the item is a very proper one, and I think all those who are familiar with the situation there realize the necessity for some provision whereby these lands which lie under the Salt River project can be irrigated from that project. I want to ask the gentleman from Arizona what his knowledge or information is as to the extent to which these lands have at this time been provided with ditches and laterals. In other words, I would like to know whether this item will necessitate any considerable expenditure by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indians are irrigating 65,000 or 75,000 acres of land at no expense to the Reclamation Service or anybody else for laterals. They have built their own laterals and they can build such additional ones as are necessary. I do not believe that they will require any aid from the Reclamation Service.

Mr. MONDELL. I am quite certain that the service did build some of these laterals. These lands are many miles from the lands that the gentleman from Missouri has in mind. They are just below where the big canal on the north side takes out of the Salt River. The gentleman will recall that he saw some of these lands from above as a party of which he was a member went over the embankment of the big ditch last summer. I am under the impression there have been some canals built over these lands by the Reclamation Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. MONDELL was given five minutes more.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the item should remain in, but if it does it is important that we should know whether it will require additional appropriation for that project.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indians are undertaking to cultivate 7,000 acres of this land, and the water is insufficient. The $20,000 would be quite an advantage in supplying them with the water that they do not now have. I think it is very necessary unless you desire to cripple the whole irrigation project. There is not a finer body of land or a richer body of land or one more available to the reservation than this is.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman, Is this $20,000 reimbursable?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; the item provides:

That the reclamation fund shall be reimbursed therefor upon terms the same as those provided in said act or acts for reimbursement by entrymen on lands irrigated by said works, and there is hereby appropriated $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the initial installment of the charges when made for said water.

Mr. BORLAND. Do these Indians have any tribal funds?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; but they have some very valuable land.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the paragraph; and then I will offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, insert at the head of the page, the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to furnish in perpetuity for the irrigation of 631 Salt River Indian allotments of 10 acres each, to be designated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, water from works constructed under the provision of the reclamation act, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto: Provided, That the reclamation fund shall be reimbursed therefor upon terms the same as those provided in said act or acts for reimbursement by entrymen on lands irrigated by said works."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me there can be no objection to that.

Mr. HAYDEN. It seems to me that that amendment is useless. The Indians have no money and they can not pay for it. If you say they shall get something and you do not appropriate the money for it, it is useless to them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Arizona withhold his point of order? I make the suggestion to the gentleman that he allow the amendment to be considered in order, then it is permissible for him to offer an amendment carrying an appropriation. He will only be spiting himself by making the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out in the second line the word "furnish" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "provide for water rights."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, amend the amendment in line 2 by striking out the word "furnish" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "provide for water rights."

Mr. HAYDEN. That is all right.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to add at the end of the amendment the words "and there is hereby appropriated $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the initial charges when made for said water."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding, at the end of the amendment, the words "and there is hereby appropriated $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the initial charges when made for said water."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming would not be in order. It is an amendment in the third degree. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and also an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri as amended.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri by striking out "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$25,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order, as it would be striking out something which the committee has already agreed to. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of a bridge across the Little Colorado River, at or near the town of Winslow, Ariz., $15,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the State of Arizona, or the county of Navajo, satisfactory guaranties of the payment by the said State of Arizona, or by the county of Navajo, of at least one-half of the cost of said bridge, and that the proper authorities of the said State of Arizona, or the said county of Navajo, shall assume full responsibility for, and will at all times maintain and repair, said bridge and the approaches thereto: And provided further, That any and all expenses above the amount herein named in connection with the building and maintaining of said bridge shall be borne either by the said State of Arizona or the said county of Navajo.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. For whose benefit is this bridge to be constructed?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Navajo Indians.

Mr. MANN. They have a large fund out there, have they not?

Mr. HAYDEN. They have no tribal funds at all. They have about 9,000,000 acres of land in their reservation.

Mr. MANN. That is "a large fund out there." Why should they not pay for this bridge?

Mr. HAYDEN. It was a mistake that there was not language included in that paragraph providing that the cost of the bridge should be reimbursable, and I should be glad to accept any amendment the gentleman may suggest.

Mr. MANN. I have not prepared an amendment, but I am perfectly willing to let it go over and have the gentleman prepare an amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order, if the gentleman from Illinois withdraws it.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order. The gentleman can make use of that at any time.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought the gentleman was about to withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. No; but I am perfectly willing to have it go over, with the point of order pending, until the gentleman prepares an amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest an amendment, after the word "interior," by inserting the words "and to be reimbursable from any funds now or hereafter placed in the Treasury to the credit of said Indians." That is the language that we have been using right along.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to accept that, and will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then I offer that as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on the point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "interior," in line 21, page 19, insert the following: "And to be reimbursable from any funds now or hereafter placed in the Treasury to the credit of said Indians."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

California.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, having reached "California," I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, February 4, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of San Diego Harbor, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 648); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting list of documents and files of papers which are not needed or useful in the transaction of current business of the department and have no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 649); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers submitting abstracts of proposals received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, for materials and labor in connection with works under the Engineer Department (H. Doc. No. 650); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. KEATING, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 655) to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from 1865 to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 115), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7817) to validate the homestead entry of George S. Clark, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 116), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.
